Upon the declaration of independence from England, the original states became independent nations and possessed all of the powers of England, except the limited powers which were conferred upon our national government. The crown lands passed to the states by right of their sovereignty. This included lands subject to flow of tide waters, submerged lands where there was no tide, and the high-lying lands. Furthermore the proprietary lands of the Penns passed to Pennsylvania and the Lord Baltimore lands to Maryland. These original nation-states also had paramount control of their waters, both navigable and unnavigable, to the same extent that any sovereign nation possesses these powers; except that our Federal government might claim subordinate interest in navigable waters, deduced from control of extra-state commerce.

As sovereignty roots in the soil and in control of the waters, so our original federated nations exercised over their entire legal areas the essential powers of sovereignty, of jurisdiction, of eminent domain, of taxing power, and of municipal authority. And precisely to the extent that the soil and waters remain under another sovereignty does such a state cease to be a sovereign nation.

Every newer state was declared to be admitted to the Union on an equal footing with the original states in every respect whatever; and precisely to the extent that the soil of each newer state remains under control of the nation does such newer state fail to attain and to exercise that equality.

When the California legislature adopted and declared lawful the rules and customs of the early gold miners, regarding appropriation of water and its use, our state was exercising its power as a nation and it placed those rules and customs under the sanction of the law of nations.

If our states, new and old, and their citizens would remember that all of the reserved state powers are national powers and are to be judged by the standards of the law of nations and to be compared with the functions of any foreign nation, and that control of soil and water are to be adjudged by such national standards, the dignity, the strength, the influence of our states would be enhanced immensely; their citizenship would be prized; and the sophistries by which the Federal courts seek to control our soil and waters and to usurp state municipal powers would fail, merely by being brought into the clear light of truth and by being exposed to the withering scorn of the aroused intelligent public opinion of a free people.

Campaign Funds.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 27, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: A signal instance of the impression now largely prevalent that the so-called "issues" of a political campaign are over 90 per cent. "bunk" and adopted merely to get votes is shown by the ludicrous prominence now attached to the question of campaign expenditures. They are called "slush funds," and, of course, are roundly denounced by both sides, as if they really had become an important issue and not a means to an end.

The following seems to be now recognized as the necessary course of procedure: First, after much newspaper discussion, a supposed Napoleon of politics is chosen as campaign manager. His duties generally are somewhat vague, but they all centre around the problem of how much money he may raise in order to stir up some political enthusiasm. This campaign manager then appoints innumerable colonels and captains and officers of all other ranks and instructs them to get out and collect the "dough" as rapidly as possible. The so-called "limit" for each contribution is merely camouflage, and I suppose one may readily defy any campaign manager that ever lived to cite a single instance where he had refused to accept a donation which was larger than the limited amount. Having more or less perfected the above plan of procedure, the second step on the part of the campaign manager is to turn his mud-engines against his opponent by charging that said opponent has collected vast sums of money.

Thus the issue is made from the mere fact that there is a campaign at all. I suggest that any campaign is a detriment and not a help to a candidate. The more of a campaign he makes the worse off he is. Obviously, therefore, he will be most successful who retires into the greatest obscurity, and the army of campaign managers, workers, etc., should be regarded as impedimenta and a more or less necessary evil.

It is difficult to picture any sincerity in these charges which are hurled at long distance by these astute generals of politics, because the most of them make their living from liberal salaries paid out of these self-same funds; and if there are no funds, then there are no salaries. Does any one suppose that the gentlemen who are now conducting the campaigns in behalf of the presidential candidates really want less money and are having difficulty in restraining the enthusiasm of contributors? But since this issue has been presented, it is suggested that it would be a good plan, in order to test the sincerity of these outcries against contributions, that nobody contribute anything to the present political campaign. Thus at least one issue of debate would be removed. As the matter now stands, one can not but feel that, every time he contributes ten dollars to a campaign fund, he is lessening the chances of his favorite and acting against his best interests. By all means, therefore, if he have the interests of his candidate at heart, let him decline to contribute and thus show his loyalty.

No doubt there has been enough money spent on elections to pay off the present huge national debt. I suggest that some one start a subscription list which shall provide that all the money sought by the various campaign managers be paid into the national treasury for some productive purpose. Then we may have a campaign without a money taint, and at least one issue will be thrown into the discard.

CRITIC.

SECRETARY COLBY AND POLAND.

It is difficult to join in the chorus of commendation that has rewarded Secretary Colby for his note on the Polish situation. One would suppose that by this time we should be a little tired of polite letter-writing, but apparently our appetite for it is as great as ever. We are still in the position of Mr. Micawber, who gave his note of hand in settlement of a bill with the comment, "Thank God, that's paid."

Mr. Colby, speaking for the government of the United States, reiterates the conviction of that government that Poland must be free and independent, that the Bolsheviks must not be recognized, and that there must be no partition of Russian territory. With this magnificent gesture we may imagine Mr. Colby as sitting back in his armchair and thanking God that at last the storm in eastern Europe has been stilled, and by a stroke of the pen. Doubtless the Poles, fighting fiercely for their freedom and independence, which have already been sold to Russia over their heads, will heave a sigh of relief as they read Mr. Colby's declaration. Doubtless Russia will see the handwriting on the wall when she learns that her government has been denied the recognition that was already accorded to it when the President sent Mr. Bullitt and Mr. Steffens cap in hand to Petrograd to plead for peace with Lenine. Doubtless her dismay will be tempered by the assurance that she will not be subjected to the dismemberment that is already an accomplished fact, and that is directly due to the great principle of self-determination that threw the blazing torch of anarchy into every powder magazine throughout the world. She has lost Finland, Poland, the Ukraine, Georgia, and Azerbaijan. What else she may lose remains to be seen, but she has now been gravely assured that her territories will remain intact. When a solemn excommunication with bell, book, and candle was launched against the Jackdaw of Rheims for the theft of the cardinal's ring it was noticed with surprise that "no one seemed a penny the worse." In our turn we may note, but without surprise, that no one is a penny the worse, or the better, for the stately document bearing Mr. Colby's name. In the language of diplomacy the world is left in statu quo ante.

During the last week we have heard very little news from Poland. The magnitude of the Polish victory is unchallenged, but at the same time we may observe that the hopes of a still greater triumph in the capture of Russian armies have not been fulfilled. Indeed there are reports of Russian successes in the capture of some few cities at the southern end of the line, and we are told from Petrograd—an unreliable source—that the summons to army service has met with a speedy and satisfactory response. Single victories do not win wars, and if we suppose that Poland has now secured her aims we may find a sharp disillusionment ahead of us. The Bolshevik government must either advance or go back. It can not stand still. And it is not likely to accept defeat at the hands of a little people like the Poles, who have been elaborately betrayed by their own friends, tacitly urged to fight and then deserted in the hour of their need. The plea that Poland brought her troubles upon herself, that she went to war against the advice of Europe, is the plea of a coward. She was re-created for the very purpose that she is now carrying out, to provide a bulwark against Bolshevism on one side and against Germanism on the other. It is true that she was advised not to make war upon the Russians for the recovery of the territory of which she had been deprived by the conference, but the advice was given hypocritically and with the hope that she would disregard it. The powers, in other words, were carrying water upon both shoulders. They hoped that Poland would make war upon the Bolsheviks and they hoped she would succeed. At the same time they had a wary eye on the possible need to conciliate Russia. For them it was heads I win, tails you lose. If the Poles were successful against the Bolsheviks it would be vastly to the advantage of Europe, which would thus see a lessening of the Bolshevik threat. If the Russians were successful the powers could then point to their efforts to restrain the aggressiveness of Poland. If they had actually wished to restrain Poland they could have done so easily by a definite statement that no aid or encouragement would be forthcoming. They did not do this. On the contrary they sent munitions and generals. They hoped for Polish success and they said so. It was only when Poland began to get the worst of it that they reminded her of their warnings and washed their hands of her fate.

Consider the iniquity of the whole proceeding. There is no need to remind ourselves of the place that Poland occupied in those golden days of idealism when we supposed that we had no more to do than to ordain light and there would be light. The independence of Poland was one of the Fourteen Points, the sine qua non of negotiations. We all know what happened, how an indefensible frontier was drawn in the face of Polish protests, how Poland was deprived of West Prussia, how she was tricked with plebiscites and all the collegiate box of toys, how she was denied the possession of Danzig and of a water-front. The coquetting with Bolshevik Russia had begun, and perhaps with interests still more sinister. The statesmen were asking themselves on which side of their bread they could find the more butter, the Polish side or the Bolshevik side. Then came the Polish war, an apparent Polish defeat, and the submission of the Russian terms. Those terms were accepted by Lloyd George in conference with Italy. They constituted the ruin of Poland. They meant that Poland must become a vassal to Russia. Her army was to be limited to 50,000 men, she was to seek no material aid in the west, her railways were to be under Russian control and Russia was to have the use of them for her own war purposes whenever it should so please her. It is true that there was one clause of the treaty against which Lloyd George and the Italian premier protested, a clause that had been concealed from them in the preliminary and verbal negotiations and by which Poland was to raise an army of workmen of much larger size than the military establishment, an army that was of course intended to establish Bolshevism. But the remainder of the treaty seems to have been acceptable to the premiers, although it was promptly rejected by the Polish delegates. The history books of the future will not talk so much of the various partitions of Poland as the greatest crime in history. That evil preeminence will be given to the treatment of Poland by the peace conference and subsequently by statesmen who were thinking more of trade facilities and tariffs than of the national honor or of that "righteousness that exalteth a nation."

What is Poland to do now? What can she do? Secretary Colby's note can hardly be regarded as a weapon of war, although we are fatuously told that it must have an effect upon the Russian people—who will never see it. Poland has been given a frontier that she can not defend. She has been asked to sign a treaty that places her completely under the control of Russia. She has been told that she need expect no help from the west. And she has incurred the unmeasured rage of the Bolsheviks by the defeat of their armies. Her lot is now a hundred times worse than before the great war. Her solitary asset is a note from Secretary Colby expressing various pious opinions that he can not enforce. It is a spectacle as shameful and humiliating as any to be found in the pages of history, and in no way redeemed by the fact that Poland is a member of the league of nations while Russia is not. So far from being served by the league of nations it will be remembered that the league representative at Danzig fought the use of that port by vessels carrying munitions for the Poles. It is likely enough that he could not help himself, that he had no force available for resistance to the rioting workmen. But the fact remains. The league was as indifferent to the fate of Poland as to a collision in interstellar space. It had been tried in the balances and it had been found wanting.

But, it may be said, the statesmen could do nothing for Poland in view of the attitude of their own working classes. That is true enough, but it is an aspect of the situation with which we need not now concern ourselves, intent for the moment only upon facts and their significance. Perhaps there might have been some unforeseen benediction upon any government that dared to do right and to fear not. If the diplomacies of the world had been undeviatingly honest the present imbroglio might have been avoided. But they were not honest. There is not a single statesman involved who has not persistently thought more of his own electoral fortunes, who is not now thinking more of them, than of the pledged honor of his nation. But for the ambition of one of those statesmen to go down to history as an Avatar of a world henceforth to be "lapped in universal law" there would have been a peace treaty signed, sealed, and delivered within one week of the armistice and irresistibly enforced by armies on the spot and flushed with victory. But for other statesmen who are even now keeping their ears close to the ground, attentive to nothing but the droppings of ballot papers, there would be a consistent and concerted policy toward Poland that would have been pursued undeviatingly and that would have given no opportunity to the forces of disorder to assume their present dictatorial powers. If the governments of the world had been willing to stand or fall by a policy of honor toward Poland, of responsibility for Poland, we should not now be threatened with the crushing of Poland and the breaking out of the flames of war upon a new and unprecedented scale. They who know their own mind never lack followers.

Lloyd George is obviously perturbed, nay controlled, by the labor situation in England. It is all very well to point to the incendiary attitude of large masses of British workmen and complacently to assure ourselves that this is not Bolshevism. It is Bolshevism. When a labor convention threatens a universal strike in case of any hostile movement against Russia there is no other name but Bolshevism to give it. That the convention was orderly—a fact much stressed by one writer—has nothing to do with the case. The fact remains that in a country possessing all but universal suffrage it was possible for the representatives of a single class to assert that they, and not Parliament, would dictate the policies of the nation. Any man or men making such a claim, such a threat, as that ought at once to be subject to the criminal law. But there was much worse than that. Mr. Smillie, perhaps the most powerful man in England, made public speeches to workmen for the purpose "of urging them to utterly refuse to recognize the coalition government and at once to form the Soviet workers' government, as the time is now arriving for the workers to control their destiny." Shall we be told that this is not Bolshevism? At Glasgow we find an organization "to inculcate Bolshevik principles and eradicate Christianity." A year ago the coal miners were told that there was "a splendid opportunity of putting the employers on the run" and that they would be able "to take control of the country and of the means of production," and so "win the masses over to socialism." Lenin in his Third Internationale mentions all these agencies of revolution. Most of them are affiliated with the I. W. W. A writer in the London Morning Post says: "It is to be noted that all these societies and movements are international in character, and none even professes to be concerned in any British labor dispute, except in so far as it contributes toward disaffection and unrest." Lloyd George does not dare to adopt any policy of his own toward Poland, that is to say he does not dare to imperil his own position or to embroil himself with labor organizations who are deaf to every call of honor, humanity, and responsibility so long as their weekly pay-rolls are satisfactorily fat. That France takes another attitude toward Poland and that to a large extent she is thus at variance with Great Britain is in no way due to a keener sense of her international obligations, but to the fact that her financial self-interest happens to lie in the overthrow of the Russian government. And how about America? Does she stand in any more favorable light? Have we forgotten that President Wilson pledged himself to the independence and integrity of Poland and that Poland and Europe in general accepted that as an American pledge? Apparently we have. But we have now reached a point where no candidate for any public position whatsoever would dare even to hint that such a pledge be kept. The President was in no way called upon at any time to make a declaration in the name of America with regard to Poland. But he did so. He included it in his Fourteen Points and to a very large extent we applauded him for doing so. Indeed there was no other government that did anything quite so definite, quite so formal as this. No other government made any declaration that was comparable with the Fourteen Points or in any way pledged itself so solemnly with regard to Poland. But today we act and speak as though we had no obligations whatsoever toward Poland, as though our highest moral duty was to cut ourselves adrift from European affairs, to declare that we are not our brother's keeper, and that we never were. Was there ever a greater fall or from a greater height?

And so Poland is to be forced to fight her battles alone, while the nations of the world pass by unheeding upon the other side of the road. The powers of world government have passed from the hands of their wise men into the hands of the ignorant, the selfish, and the corrupt. The moral tone of the world, and particularly of the political world, is lower, far lower, than it was before the war. What will happen if Poland should be overrun? Mr. Frank H. Simonds answers accurately enough when he says in a recent writing: "Yet the truth is that our brother's danger is ours. Hence the Polish collapse must presently disclose itself as one of the gravest of all contemporary events, a defeat for the West in a new struggle with the East, the loss of our first line of defenses against Red terror and Bolshevik tyranny."

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Bessie McCoy Davis will soon return to the stage. She strained a ligament in her knee while dancing in Philadelphia in the spring and went to Atlantic City with her little daughter. Hope, and has spent three months there in retirement. Recently she moved to a quiet apartment house, where she hoped to be unrecognized, but was disillusioned the first time she left her apartment.

Stephen Leacock, the "Mark Twain of Canada," is described as a short-necked, heavy-set, informal man, with a rumple of hair that hangs over his forehead. His ruddy face, with a genial wrinkle or two and a stubby mustache somewhere in the neighborhood of his mouth and splendid crows' feet at the eyes, is an amiable, neighborly face. He delights, he says, "to appeal to the simplest minds—though I have never met one of those—giving no moral precepts or instruction."

Saving souls with the aid of soup is not new, but as practiced by the Rev. Mr. Ben Cox, pastor of the Central Baptist Church, Memphis, Tennessee, it presents some novel features. On January 14, 1914, eight men, assembled in the pastor's study, formed themselves to be in prayer wherever they might be at the noon hour every day. More than 2500 persons from thirty states of the Union have become members of this strange league, which recently celebrated its sixth anniversary.

Mr. William Archer is a born Scotsman, who has been in London so long that he acts like an Englishman and must be regarded as one. He has done so much, albeit he won't talk at length of these achievements. Others have done that for him, and the more important products of his own work are set down permanently in good type and are to be found in permanent form over in the public library. Archer is sixty-four years old, although he appears to be ten years younger. He is a solemn sort of a person, without being too solemn. His smile is soft, but so uncutaneous that it is worth more than the uproarious laugh produced by men of lesser genius. He is tall and apparently muscular and stands like a heavyweight.

A plan unique in many respects and one that starts an endless chain of educational opportunity for boys who in the ordinary course of events would live "to fortune and to fame unknown" has been put into concrete form by John Borg of New York in his recent endowment of the Dr. Isaac W. Gowen scholarship of Union Hill High School, Union Hill, New Jersey. Mr. Borg was graduated from Union Hill High School in the class of 1897. He had a great desire to go further in formal education, but was unable to do so. He took a job in a Broad Street office as a $4-a-week boy, and from that position has fought his way up until he is now one of the successful men in the financial district, with a fortune in seven figures. His desire to give to other boys a better opportunity than he himself enjoyed has long existed and been practically applied, as he has already helped twelve boys to a college education.

Money is probably the most remote and least important of objects that underlie the life philosophy of Frederick G. Cottrell, who recently was appointed by President Wilson director of the United States Bureau of Mines. But he doesn't pursue science for the sake of science alone; he ever tries to link science with the practical needs of the times and has succeeded in several notable directions. He is a young man, only slightly above forty. He was born in Oakland, California, and was graduated from the University of California in 1896, after completing a four years' course in three years. He earned the Le Conte fellowship, which enabled him to take a postgraduate course, after which he taught chemistry for a period of three years in the high school of his native city. Then he went to Germany, where he earned from the University of Leipzig the degrees of Master of Arts and Doctor of Philosophy. Returning to America, he joined the faculty of the University of California, where he remained until entering government service in 1911.

The Plaidie.

Upon ane stormy Sunday,
Coming adoon the lane,
Were a score of bonnie lasses—
And the sweetest I maintain
Was Caddie,
That I took unneath my plaidie,
To shield her from the rain.

She said that the daisies blushed
For the kiss that I had ta'en;
I wad na hae thought the lassie
Wad sae of a kiss complain:
"Now, laddie!
I winna stay under your plaidie,
I'll gang awa hame in the rain!"

But, on an after Sunday,
When cloud there was not ane,
This self-same winsome lassie
(We chanced to meet in the lane)
Said, "Laddie,
Why dinna ye wear your plaidie?
Wha kens but it may rain?"

Cardinal Wolsey's Farewell to Power.

Farewell, a long farewell to all my greatness!
This is the state of man: Today he puts forth
The tender leaves of hopes, tomorrow blossoms,
And bears his blushing honors thick upon him;
The third day comes a frost, a killing frost;
And, when he thinks, good easy man, full surely
His greatness is a-ripening,—nips his root,
And then he falls as I do. I have ventured,
Like little wanton boys that swim on bladders,
This many summers in a sea of glory,
But far beyond my depth: my high-blown pride
At length broke under me; and now has left me
Weary, and old with service, to the mercy
Of a rude stream, that must forever hide me.
Vain pomp and glory of this world, I hate ye.
I feel my heart new opened: O, how wretched
Is that poor man who hangs on princes' favors!
There is, betwixt that smile we would aspire to,
That sweet aspect of princes, and their ruin,
More pangs and fears than wars or women have;
And when he falls, he falls like Lucifer, Never to hope again.
—Shakespeare.

How They Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix.

I sprang to the stirrup, and Joris and he:
I galloped, Dirck galloped, we galloped all three;
"Good speed!" cried the watch as the gatebolts undrew,
"Speed!" echoed the wall to us galloping through.
Behind shut the postern, the lights sank to rest,
And into the midnight we galloped abreast.

Not a word to each other; we kept the great pace—
Neck by neck, stride by stride, never changing our place;
I turned in my saddle and made its girths tight,
Then shortened each stirrup and set the pique right,
Rebuckled the check-strap, chained slacker the bit,
Nor galloped less steadily Roland a whit.

'Twas a moonset at starting; but while we drew near Lokeren, the cocks crew and twilight dawned clear;
At Boom a great yellow star came out to see;
At Duffeld 'twas morning as plain as could be;
And from Mechlen church-steeple we heard the half-chime—
So Joris broke silence with "Yet there is time!"

At Aerschot up leaped of a sudden the sun,
And against him the cattle stood black every one,
To stare through the mist at us galloping past;
And I saw my stout galloper Roland at last
With resolute shoulders, each buttng away
The haze, as some bluff river headland its spray;

And his low head and crest, just one sharp ear bent back
For my voice, and the other pricked out on his track;
And one eye's black intelligence,—ever that glance
O'er its white edge at me, his own master, askance;
And the thick, heavy spume-flakes, which aye and anon
His fierce lips shook upward in galloping on.

By Hasselt Dirck groaned; and cried Joris, "Stay spur!
Your Roos galloped bravely, the fault's not in her;
We'll remember at Aix"—for one heard the quick wheeze
Of her chest, saw the stretched neck, and staggering knees,
And sunk tail, and horrible heave of the flank,
As down on her haunches she shuddered and sank.

So we were left galloping, Joris and I,
Past Looz and past Tongres, no cloud in the sky:
The broad sun above laughed a pitiless laugh;
'Neath our feet broke the brittle, bright stubble like chaff;
Till over by Delham a dome-spire sprang white,
And "Gallop," gasped Joris, "for Aix is in sight!"

"How they'll greet us!"—and in a moment his roan
Rolled neck and croup over, lay dead as a stone:
And there was my Roland to bear the whole weight
Of the news which alone could save Aix from her fate,
With his nostrils like pits full of blood to the brim,
And with circles of red for his eye-sockets' rim.

Then I cast loose my buff-coat, each holster let fall,
Shook off both my jack-boots, let go belt and all,
Stood up in the stirrup, leaned, patted his ear,
Called my Roland his pet-name, my horse without peer—
Clapped my hands, laughed and sung, any noise, had or good,
Till at length into Aix, Roland galloped and stood.

And all I remember is, friends flocking round,
As I sat with his head 'twixt my knees on the ground;
And no voice but was praising this Roland of mine,
As I poured down his throat our last measure of wine
Which (the burgesses voted by common consent)
Was no more than his due who brought the good news from Ghent.
—Robert Browning.

Some eighty years ago Joseph Gillett was a working jeweler in Birmingham, England. One day he accidentally split one of his fine steel tools, and being suddenly required to sign a receipt, and not finding a pen handy, he used the split tool as a substitute. This happy accident is said to have led to the idea of making pens of metal.

THIS SIMIAN WORLD.

Clarence Day, Jr., Accounts for Our Peculiarities on the Ground That We Are Actually Monkeys.

The characteristics of the human race, says Clarence Day, Jr., in his "This Simian World," may easily be explained. If we had been descended from eagles, for example, instead of monkeys, if we had been made directly from clay the way it says in the Bible, and had therefore inherited no intermediate characteristics, we might have been molded into much more splendid forms. A crowd in the street would not then have seemed so aimless, staring, and vacant-minded. But being descended from monkeys—not a very long descent either—we are what we are, richly endowed with monkey traits, doing most things according to the rules of the monkey world. We fight, for instance, not singly like lions and leopards, but in bands:

As a matter of fact, few of us delight in really serious fighting. We love to bicker; and we box and knock each other around, to exhibit our strength; but few normal simians are keen about bloodshed and killing; we do it in war only because of patriotism, revenge, duty, glory. A feline civilization would have cared nothing for duty or glory, but they would have taken a far higher pleasure in gore. If a planet of super-cat-men could look down upon ours, they would not know which to think was the most amazing: the way we tamely live, five million or so in a city, with only a few police to keep us quiet, while we commit only one or two murders a day, and hardly have a respectable number of brawls; or the way great armies of us are trained to fight—not liking it much, and yet doing more killing in war-time and shedding more blood than even the fiercest lion on his cruelest days. Which would perplex a gentlemanly super-cat spectator the more, our habits of wholesale slaughter in the field, or our spiritless making a fetish of "order" at home?

Inventions come easily to simians. Their homes are filled with tricky appliances, bell-ringing appliances, locks, clocks, and so forth. Some of their inventions are beautiful, but the simian-ness of the people will cheat them of half their dues because they do not know real values:

To consider examples: A discovery that helps them to talk, just to talk, more and more, will be hailed by these beings as one of the highest of triumphs. Talking to each other over wires will come in this class. The lightning when harnessed and tamed will be made to trot round, conveying the most trivial cacklings all day and night.

Huge seas of talk of every sort and kind, in print, speech and writing, will roll unceasingly over their civilized realms, involving an unbelievable waste in labor and time, and sapping the intelligence talk is supposed to upbuild. In a simian civilization, great halls will be erected for lectures, and great throngs will actually pay to go inside at night to hear some self-satisfied talk-maker chatter for hours. Almost any subject will do for a lecture, or talk; yet very few subjects will be counted important enough for the average man to do any thinking on them, off by himself.

But they dream hopefully of a state even worse than the present. This they will achieve by a system called mental telepathy, so that all their minds will be awash with messages every moment. Now a cat civilization instead of a monkey civilization would have invented more barriers instead of more channels:

Discoveries in surgery and medicine will also be overpraised. The reason will be that the race will so need these discoveries. Unlike the great cats, simians tend to undervalue the body. Having less self-respect, less proper regard for their egos, they care less than the cats do for the casing of the ego,—the body. The more civilized they grow the more they will let their bodies deteriorate. They will let their shoulders stoop, their lungs shrink, and their stomachs grow fat. No other species will be quite so deformed and distorted. Athletics they will watch, yes, but on the whole sparingly practice. Their snuffy old scholars will even be proud to decay them. Where once the simians swung high through forests, or scampered like deer, their descendants will plod around farms, or mince along streets, moving constrictedly, slowly, their liteness half gone.

They will think of Nature as "something to go out and look at." They will try to live wholly apart from her and forget they're her sons. Forget? They will even deny it, and declare themselves sons of God. In spite of her wonders they will regard Nature as something too humble to be the true parent of such prominent people as simians. They will lose all respect for the dignity of fair Mother Earth, and whisper to each other she is an evil and indecent old person. They will snatch at her gifts, pry irreverently into her mysteries, and ignore half the warnings they get from her about how to live.

Ailments of every kind will abound among such folk, inevitably, and they will resort to extraordinary expedients in their search for relief. Although squeamish as a race about inflicting much pain in cold blood, they will systematically infect other animals with their own rank diseases, or cut out other animals' organs, or kill and dissect them, hoping thus to learn how to offset their neglect of themselves. Conditions among them will be such that this will really be necessary. Few besides impractical sentimentalists will therefore oppose it. But the idea will be to gain health by legerdemain, by a trick, instead of by taking the trouble to live healthy lives.

Strange barrack-like buildings called hospitals will stand in their cities, where their trick-men, the surgeons, will slice them right open when ill; and thousands of zealous young pharmacists will mix little drugs, which thousands of wiselooking simians will firmly prescribe. Each generation will change its mind as to these drugs, and laugh at all former opinions; but each will use some of them, and each will feel assured that in this respect they know the last word.

And, in obstinate blindness, this people will wag their poor heads, and attribute their diseases, not to simian-ness, but to civilization.

The cleverness of a simian civilization will prove to be its undoing. It compels all the lower animals to work for it and to do the things that it ought to do for itself. Then the body deteriorates and the end is worse than the beginning:

They will talk about improving the race—they will talk about everything—but they won't use their chances to do it. Whenever a new discovery makes life less hard, for example, these heedless beings will seldom preserve this advantage, or use their new wealth to take more time thereafter for thought, or to gain health and strength or do anything else to make the race better. Instead, they will use the new ease just to increase in numbers; and they will keep on at this until misery once more has checked them. Life will then be as bad as ever, naturally, and the chance will be gone.

Observe, says the author, the Bandarlog at play in the forest. How boastful they are and how terrified. Naturally they invent things called gods. With no self-reliance, they can not face life alone. And what strange things their gods are. They create the universes and disapprove of dancing. They incite "holy" wars and are grieved by divorce:

All gods that any groups of simians ever conceive of, from the woodenest little idol in the forest to the mightiest Spirit, no matter how much they may differ, will have one trait in common: a readiness to drop any cosmic affair at short notice, focus their minds on the far-away pellet called Earth, and become immediately wholly concerned, aye, engrossed, with any individual worshipper's woes or desires,—a readiness to notice a fellow when he is going to bed. This will bring indescribable comfort to simian hearts; and a god that neglects this duty won't last very long, no matter how competent he may be in other respects.

But one must reciprocate. The gods invented by the simians demand deference and attention, prayers and hymns. None the less if a simian humanity should ever be swept aside as a failure what an interesting failure it will be. Mr. Day has certainly written an interesting little book, and with much grim sense beneath its humor.

THE TEST.

A Volume of Sketches by Maurice Level Introduces Us to a French Writer on the Weird and the Horrible.

(M. Maurice Level is a Frenchman and a physician, and is now about forty years of age. His first story was written in a hospital. He took it to the editor of Le Journal and it was accepted, and his stories have been accepted by that newspaper ever since. Now we have a translation of twenty-six of these sketches published by Robert M. McBride & Co. under the title of "Tales of Mystery and Horror." The translation, excellent in quality, is the work of Alys Eyre Macklin. The story here reprinted is a fair example of M. Level's work.)

Not a muscle quivered as the man stood with his gaze fixed on the dead woman.

Through half-closed eyes he looked at the white form on the marble slab; milky-white it was, with a red gash between the breasts where the cruel knife had entered. In spite of its rigidity, the body had kept its rounded beauty and seemed alive. Only the hands, with their too transparent skin and violet finger-nails, and the face with its glazed, wide-open eyes and blackened mouth, a mouth that was set in a horrible grin, told of the eternal sleep.

An oppressive silence weighed on the dreary, stone-paved hall. Lying on the ground beside the dead woman was the sheet that had covered her: there were blood-stains on it. The magistrates were closely watching the accused man as he stood unmoved between the two warders, his head well up, a supercilious expression on his face, his hands crossed behind his back.

The examining magistrate opened the proceedings: "Well, Gautet, do you recognize your victim?"

The man moved his head, looking first at the magistrate, then with reflective attention at the dead woman as if he were searching in the depths of his memory.

"I do not know this woman," he said at length in a low voice. "I have never seen her before."

"Yet there are witnesses who will state on oath that you were her lover. . . ."

"The witnesses are mistaken. I never knew this woman."

"Think well before you answer," said the magistrate after a moment's silence. "What is the use of trying to mislead us? This confrontation is the merest formality, not at all necessary in your case. You are intelligent, and if you wish for any clemency from the jury, I advise you in your own interest to confess."

"Being innocent, I have nothing to confess."

"Once again, remember that these denials have no weight at all. I myself am prepared to believe that you gave way to a fit of passion, one of these sudden mad-nesses when a man sees red. . . . Look again at your victim. . . . Can you see her lying there like that and feel no emotion, no repentance? . . ."

"Repentance, you say? How can I repent of what I have not done? . . . As for emotion, if mine was not entirely deadened, it was at least considerably lessened by the simple fact that I knew what I was going to see when I came here. I feel no more emotion than you do yourself. Why should I? I might just as well accuse you of the crime because you stand there unmoved."

He spoke in an even voice, without gestures, as a man would who had complete control of himself. The overwhelming charge left him apparently undisturbed and he confined his defense to calm, obstinate denials.

One of the minor officials said in an undertone: "They will get nothing out of him. . . . He will deny it even on the scaffold."

Without a trace of anger, Gautet replied: "That is so, even on the scaffold."

The sultry atmosphere of an impending thunderstorm added to the feeling of exasperation caused by this struggle between accusers and accused, this obstinate "no" to every question in the face of all evidence.

Through the dirty window-pane the setting threw a vivid golden glare on the corpse.

"So be it," said the magistrate: "You do not know the victim. But what about this?"

He held out an ivory-handled knife, a large knife with clotted blood on its strong blade.

The man took the weapon into his hands, looked at it for a few seconds, then handed it to one of the warders and wiped his fingers.

"That? . . . I have never seen it before either."

"Systematic denial . . . that is your plan, is it?" sneered the magistrate. "This knife is yours. It used to hang in your study. Twenty people have seen it there."

The prisoner bowed. "That proves nothing but that twenty people have made a mistake."

"Enough of this," said the magistrate. "Though there is not a shadow of doubt about your guilt, we will make one last decisive test. There are marks of strangulation on the neck of the victim. You can clearly see the traces of five fingers, particularly long fingers, the medical expert tells us. Show these gentlemen your hands. You see?"

The magistrate raised the chin of the dead woman. There were violet marks on the white skin of the neck: at the end of every bruise the flesh was deeply pitted, as if nails had been dug in. It looked like the skeleton of a giant leaf.

"There is your handiwork. Whilst with your left hand you were trying to strangle this poor woman, with your free right hand you drove this knife into her heart. Come here and repeat the action of the night of the murder. Place your fingers on the bruises of the neck. . . . Come along. . . ."

Gautet hesitated for a second, then shrugged his shoulders and said in a sullen voice:

"You wish to see if my fingers correspond? . . . and suppose they do? . . . What will that prove? . . ."

He moved towards the slab: he was noticeably paler, his teeth were clenched, his eyes dilated. For a moment he stood very still, his gaze fixed on the rigid body, then with an automaton-like gesture, he stretched out his hand and laid it on the flesh.

The involuntary shudder that ran through him at the cold, clammy contact caused a sudden, sharp movement of his fingers which contracted as if to strangle.

Under this pressure the set muscles of the dead woman seemed to come to life. You could see them stretch obliquely from the collar-bone to the angle of the jaw: the mouth lost its horrible grin and opened as if in an atrocious yawn, the dry lips drew back to disclose teeth encrusted with thick, brown slime.

Every one started with horror.

There was something enigmatic and terrifying about this gaping mouth in this impassive face, this mouth open as if for a death-rattle from beyond the portals of the grave, the sound only held back by the swollen tongue that was doubled back in the throat.

Then, all at once, there came from that black hole a low, undefined noise, a sort of humming that suggested a hive, and an enormous blue-bottle with shining wings, one of these charnel-house flies that live on death, an unspeakable filthy beast, flew out, hissing as it circled round the cavern as if to guard the approach. Suddenly it paused . . . then made a straight course for the blue lips of Gautet.

With a motion of horror, he tried to drive it away: but the monstrous thing came back, clinging to his lips with all the strength of its poisonous claws.

With one bound the man leaped backwards, his eyes wild, his hair on end, his hands stretched out, his whole body quivering as he shrieked like a madman:

"I confess! . . . I did it! . . . Take me away! . . . Take me away! . . ."

A monograph in the London Financial Times on the history of the old Citizens' Bank of Louisiana, at New Orleans, reveal the origin of the name "Dixie Land"—the term applied now to all the Southern states and preserved in the famous Southern war song, "Dixie." Prior to the civil war the Citizens' Bank, having the power to issue paper notes, issued several millions of bills in denominations of $10 and $20, but mostly $10. The ten-dollar bills were engraved in French with the French word Dix featured on their backs. The bills became known as "Dixies," and this money becoming popular, Louisiana was referred to as the "Land of Dixies," or "Dixie Land." Eventually the term was so broadened as to apply to all the Southern states. This seems a very acceptable explanation of the origin of the term, which has been the subject of so much discussion.

England today has no law school in existence. Harvard's Law School is not only the oldest existing law school in the United States, but it is the oldest existing academic law school in the English-speaking world. They have a professor of law at Cambridge and a professor of law at Oxford, in England, but they do not teach law in the manner of a professional school. They simply lecture upon law, or endeavor to give a scientific preparation for the profession of law, but do not give scientific, professional training.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending August 28, 1920, were $150,100,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $127,000,000; a gain of $23,100,000.

A decrease of $3,897,000 in gold reserves for the business week ended August 27th was shown in the weekly comparative statement of condition made public Saturday by the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco. Total gold reserves this week are reported at $158,440,000, as against a total of $162,337,000 for the previous week. The total of gold held by banks within the district, however, is reported unsettling effects of liquidation and price readjustments upon general industry have become more apparent than at any time since the reaction in trade set in (says John Grant Dater in Harper's Magazine). There is a disposition on the part of many experienced observers to attribute the expanding application of contraction—that is, its extension to and inclusive of numerous industries which had escaped its influences heretofore—to the delays and difficulties of transportation, and that may be the case. Car shortage and freight congestion have been fruitful sources of disturbances for the better part of a year, and the situation has not improved materially in recent weeks. But to the contrary, in some respects and in certain locations conditions have gone from bad to worse.

This is particularly true of the iron and steel industry in the Pittsburgh and Chicago districts. An alarming shortage of fuel throughout the country, the result of a combination of circumstances, such as a reduction of reserve supplies, increased consumption, and diminished production—the last growing out of strikes and labor disturbances—induced the Interstate Commerce Commission to grant priority rights on coal shipments. There can be no doubt that this action was necessary, for countless plants throughout the country in the early summer were forced to shut down for lack of fuel, and the closure of numerous others, particularly in New England, was threatened, through the inability of the public utility corporations, which supply them with light and heat and power, to obtain their usual supplies of coal. But the diversion of a large number of open-top freight cars to provide for the transshipment of fuel reacted harmfully upon many other industries which were deprived of their customary facilities for transportation.

Among the larger activities of the country, the iron and steel industry has been the chief sufferer from the shortage of fuel and the steps taken to correct the situation. Coke has advanced enormously and has been quoted recently as high as $20 a ton, which contrasts with an average price of $7.50 a ton earlier in the year. This, of course, has added greatly to production costs, and it is to be noted, in contradistinction to the tendencies displayed elsewhere, that the prices of iron and steel have advanced. On the other hand, however, the inadequacy of transportation facilities has resulted in a vast accumulation of finished steel, as much as 2,000,000 tons being piled up at Pittsburgh alone, and the difficulties recently have reflected in a banking of furnaces and a marked curtailment of production. It is difficult to say what the situation would have been in iron and steel, or, for that matter, in any other of the larger industries under normal transportation conditions.

There can be no question, of course, that the setback in general trade has been intensified by the delays and difficulties in obtaining raw material and supplies, particularly fuel, and in shipping finished products; but it may be doubted if a free and unimpeded movement of merchandise would have prevented or even deferred the recession for any great length of time. The necessity of contraction was emphasized by the Federal Reserve Board as far back as November last, and attention was directed to the dangers of inflation and the over-expansion of bank loans long before that date by individual bankers and financial experts. The cautionings and the warnings were in no way associated with car shortage or freight congestion, which did not develop until a much later period. The reaction originated in the credit strain and the efforts of the Federal Reserve banks to force deflation.

That the readjustment has been accelerated by such developments as the financial crises in Japan and the Far East, the bitter antagonism of the public to the further extortion by retail merchants which led to the extensive price-cutting campaign, and the transportation situation is not to be denied; but an overburdening of credit is at the bottom of all the trouble, and it is difficult to see how there can be any long-sustained or extensive improvement in conditions until the source of the disturbance has been removed. This centres in the insufficiency of the reserves to support the vast volume of banking liabilities which have been reared upon them, and the true solution rests, not in the clearing up of railway tracks and terminals, but in a further contraction of loans or liquidation. That a reestablishment of normal transportation conditions would help in this matter is not to be denied, for freight congestion has "frozen" a large volume of credits, and their liquefaction would afford relief.

There are some persons, many persons, in fact—who speak of industrial reactions with bated breath, not realizing, apparently, that they are the remedy, and not the disease. True it is, no doubt, that the curative processes may be very unpleasant for some persons—for corporations and manufacturers with large and inflated inventories; for merchants and dealers with heavy stocks of high-priced goods on hand; and for speculators and operators committed, perhaps, irrevocably through syndicate agreements or other undertakings, to the long side of the securities or commodities markets. These may suffer extensive losses in the decline in prices and it would be regrettable if such should be the outcome, but such things fall within the contingencies of business. One man's loss is ever another man's gain, and who can doubt but that the community as a whole would be very much benefited if the prices of all commodities and necessities should fall 50 per cent., or even to the pre-war level.

Careful observers do not, of course, look for any such extensive decline as that, except, possibly, in one or two rare instances, where prices have been advanced to an inordinate level as a result of unbridled speculation. Of this raw silk, the collapse in the price of which led the reaction and first directed the attention of the textile industry and the entire business community to the instability of inflated commodity values, affords the most striking illustration. At the beginning of August the variety and grade of raw silk known as Sinushiu No. 1, which sold in January last at $17.85 a pound, was quoted at $5.22½ a pound, a decline of 70 per cent. from the highest price of the year. Even at this low level there was no activity in the silk market, for, as the Journal of Commerce of New York said in commenting upon the situation, "The mills which are either closed entirely or running on part time appear to have all the raw material they need."

What has developed in the silk market—that is, a large accumulation of raw material when only a scant supply was believed to exist and a violent decline in prices, when the speculative buying craze had spent its force, was well in line with all economic experience. The situation arises from the fact that relatively few men have the courage to buy in falling markets, and not alone that, but those who purchase speculatively in anticipation of a further advance, and those who purchase legitimately to provide for actual requirements, are both disposed in times of reaction to sell. They are anxious to limit their losses, if possible, but these may be accentuated by the unexpectedly large volume of goods and wares which are brought into sight and pressed for sale. This has developed recently not only in silks and the manufactures thereof, but in wool and woolen goods, and to some extent also in staple cotton and cotton fabrics.

While the tendencies which have developed in the textile industry go a long way in refuting the arguments of those observers who asserted there could be no serious reaction, because all the elements of high production costs were present in the situation, they are not wholly conclusive on that point. Textiles and wearing apparel, for example, have been more directly affected by the price-cutting campaign of the retail merchants than any other lines. The consumers have fallen into a way of believing that dry-goods prices must come down, and they have impressed the department store buyers with that idea. The latter, as a result, have refrained from placing their customary orders, for the manufacturers have been unwilling, as a class, to make substantial concessions upon the score that these were not justified by the prevailing high cost of raw material and labor.

In some instances where reductions have been made they have failed to stimulate buying; the dry-goods jobbing trade has been almost at a standstill and there has been a marked curtailment of production in woolen goods. This has reacted sharply upon raw wool, which has become well-nigh unsalable, and the wool-growers have had to appeal to the Federal Reserve Board for assistance in financing and handling the clip. One of the difficulties which has beset the woolen goods industry is an extensive cancellation of orders, which is a dishonest and dishonorable practice—buying under false pretenses—which has resulted in a blacklisting of some dealers and a withdrawal of credit from others who have resorted to it. But the chief difficulty of late appears to be an inability to determine values. To obviate this and stimulate the movement of goods, some merchants have resorted to the doubtful old-time policy of "stock protection and guarantee," thereby obligating themselves to charge up all merchandise sold, or such as remains unmarketed by the jobber up to a certain date at the lowest price established during the interval.

Ample and attractive is the security for a $480,000 issue of City of Idaho Falls (Idaho) one to ten year 6½% Improvement Bonds, because this city is the business heart of the entire irrigated acreage and vast agricultural wealth of the Snake River Valley.

The offering is income tax exempt, priced to yield 7% net, and particularly recommended to careful investors because of its substantial qualities.

ing price uncertainties is true also of practically all industries, and this has been the dominating influence in the markets of the recent past. Price readjustments are working out everywhere along the line of least resistance, and the progressive decline in values has created a widespread depression of sentiment. There was a marked decline in the volume of bank clearings throughout the country during the month of July, for instance, and commercial failures in June, according to the figures compiled by R. J. Dun & Co., involving liabilities of $32,990,963, were the largest for that month since 1916. Aside from the defaults which were openly an-employees by the Pennsylvania Railroad, has been another recent consequence of reaction. It is not surprising, under the circumstances, that after a long interval of inactivity liquidation should have reappeared in the stock market. The selling movement was preceded, however, by an outburst of professional activity which for a time resulted in a higher level of prices.

The $480,000 issue of one to ten-year 6½ per cent. improvement bonds of the City of Idaho Falls has been purchased entire by the Lumhermens Trust Company and is announced in $100, $500, and $1000 denominations to yield 7 per cent. net, income tax exempt.

In the opinion of John Dwight Neale, vice-president of the company, the offering is particularly fortunate from the investor's standpoint because of the important strategic location of the city as the geographical trading and shipping centre of the irrigated lands of the fertile Snake River Valley.

From these million and a quarter acres Idaho Falls annually ships 7500 carloads of agricultural products alone, and the total freight shipments of the city are greater than those of any other city on the entire Union Pacific Railroad system.

Against an actual estimated value of twelve million dollars, the total net bonded debt, including this issue, is but $638,000. And it is stated that income from the city's ownership and operation of the waterfalls is sufficient alone to meet bond interest and sinking fund and pay a net profit to the general expense fund.

The Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company report earnings for the Steel and Tuhe Company of America for the seven months ending July 31, 1920, as follows: Gross earnings after Federal taxes, $7,272,755; interest, $980,213; net earnings, $6,292,542; preferred dividends, $714,584; surplus, $5,577,958. Surplus earnings, after allowing for preferred dividends, are equivalent to $5.74 a share on the $1,941,884 (par value $2 per share) common stock.

After a month's vacation, G. Brashears, general sales manager for Stephens & Co., is in San Francisco on a tour of all the company's offices. While away he took occasion to notice the general prosperity of the California farmers and to note the strides being made by some of the large ranches. He says: "When one sees the businesslike efficiency of the large ranch and the use of machinery on a large scale it is not surprising that these enterprises should be so generally successful. This probably accounts for the steady demand we find for high-grade first-mortgage farm land bonds. This demand in face of the showing made by the recent Eastern issues is a real tribute to this type of security, and one which is well deserved."

An offering of $80,000 Cordua Irrigation District, Yuba County, California, gold 6 per cent. bonds, yielding 6½ per cent., tax exempt, is being made by the Freeman, Smith & Camp Company in denominations of $1000. These bonds constitute a tax lien ranking ahead of all first mortgages, including Federal farm loans on 6122 acres of productive farm lands about five miles northeast of Marysville. The principal crops are alfalfa, fruit, grain, and rice. Earnings from crops in 1919 were at the rate of over $34 per acre—about 12.7 times bond requirements—greater than the total amount of bonds. The 1920 earnings are estimated to exceed thirty-eight times bond requirements or three and one-fourth times the total bonds. A rich red loam is almost uniform throughout the district and is underlaid by a heavier sub-soil of impervious clay. This makes an almost ideal condition for irrigation, as the soil holds water readily, while the slope of the lands insures sufficient drainage. The district is traversed by the Southern Pacific Railroad from Oroville to Marysville and the main line of the Western Pacific Railroad. The Ukiah-Tahoe Unit of the state highway will run through the district.

The gradual improvement of transportation which has been effected during recent weeks has permitted a somewhat more rapid movement of grain than had been anticipated. Consequently the holdover from the preceding year has in good measure been cared for and the new crop-moving season has begun on schedule and under more favorable conditions than seemed possible a month ago (says the National Bank of Commerce of New York regarding current conditions). It is reported from some sections of the Middle West that bank loans to finance the actual harvesting of the new crops are being reduced at an earlier date than is usually the case. While the credit requirements of the new movement will not reach maximum volume for some time to come, and while easier credit can not be expected until the peak of the movement has passed, the situation has improved sufficiently to make reasonably clear that the autumn agricultural demands for credit will not be in excess of the ability of the banks to supply.

There are indications also that many commercial borrowers, in response to expectations of a credit stringency during the fall which have prevailed for many months, have at least to some extent anticipated their autumn requirements for credit. This factor, coupled with the continued tendency toward reduced volume of business and lower prices for many commodities, may be expected to relieve the pressure of commercial and industrial credit requirements. It must be recognized, however, that some little time will be necessary for this relief to make itself manifest, because of the interval which must elapse before a new policy in business brings results.

Rates in the New York money market have ruled steady throughout the period of July 16th-August 15th. Commercial borrowings in the open market have continued at a firm level of 8 per cent. Call money rates, which ruled at 9 per cent. at the beginning of the period, gradually declined to about 6 per cent. at its close. This decline has reflected, not a surplus of funds available for stock exchange employment, but the reduced volume of requirements resulting from continued stock liquidation.

The bond market has experienced a real measure of improvement during the period under review. The absorption by investors of corporate and particularly of railroad securities has been good and has extended to bonds of the second and third grade. The general trend of prices, moreover, has been moderately upward.

This improvement in tone is a reflection of the more definite and improved position of the railroads which will result from the settlement of the railroad wage question and the allowance of substantially increased freight and passenger rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It reflects, also, a feeling that the readjustment of business and prices to a more normal level is proceeding satisfactorily and that this process will ultimately release to the investment market a more adequate supply of credit. While these factors have occasioned a moderate upward trend of bond prices, the tremendous volume of new financing which awaits a favorable market constitutes a retarding element which may occasion repeated fluctuations in the trend. It must be expected that at each new level of prices outstanding bond issues will meet with the competition of new flotations.

Although superficially not much change is evident in the general business situation from that of July 15th, nevertheless underlying intrinsic conditions are slowly and steadily making for a sounder situation. An important element is the determination of business interests to carry into effect a new policy of conducting their affairs on sane and conservative lines, looking toward stability and continuance in business rather than to the policy which until recently prevailed of doing as much business as possible at high prices on a basis of excited public buying with resulting abnormal profits.

The necessity for an advance in railroad rates had long been beyond argument, but even among those who regarded this advance as necessary there had been a considerable doubt as to the effect upon prices of products which move on a tonnage basis. Temporarily the effect of these rate advances will be reflected in prices of bulky articles, although there should be little or no reflection in prices of articles the value of which is relatively high in relation to weight. Certain offsetting circumstances are not to be ignored, however. As long as the railroads were unable adequately to expand their facilities to handle the freight offered to them, business in all lines suffered under a most serious handicap because of hampered transportation. In some cases this has been reflected violently in prices. If the rate advances enable the railroads to build up their plant and equipment sufficiently to handle freight, expansion of production in all lines will become possible, and the friction involved in the present process of distribution will be eliminated. It will take a considerable time to reach this result, but when it is attained the final effect of increased rates will be to lower prices.

Russia and America.

Mr. Spargo need hardly have written so large a book to prove that Russia is an American problem, although he would have to write a much larger one to prove that we ought to supply Russia on credit with whatever she happens to need. It may be said further that if we are inclined to doubt the value of such books as this except in so far as they are historical it is in no way intended as a disparagement of Mr. Spargo's ability or information. He falls under the double error of supposing that the governments of the world are actuated in their foreign relations by a sentiment of good will toward Russia and in their domestic relations by rectitude and intelligence. Whereas they are thinking of nothing but of parties and of votes.

The present condition of Russia is the necessary and inevitable result of the treatment that has been accorded to her during the last four hundred years. Russia has been practically excluded from the comity of European nations and her every effort toward national development has been spitefully and causelessly thwarted. And now when her internal diseases are found to be contagious we hold up our hands in horror at what we call the aftermath of war and bestow the blame impartially upon every one but ourselves. When Russia underwent her revolution we proclaimed her and proscribed her as an enemy and thereby placed the Bolsheviks in the position of Russian protagonists. The situation might even then have been tolerable if we had been consistent even in our enmity. But we were not. We fawned upon the Bolsheviks on Tuesdays and Fridays and hulled them on Wednesdays and Saturdays. Professing to create a Poland that should be a rampart against Bolshevism, we saw to it that Poland should be so weak as to be helpless, and by way of driving the last nail in her coffin we deprived her of Danzig and of all her ocean territory. Professing to dread an alliance between Russia and Germany, we did all we could to make it inevitable and we are now doing what else we can to drive Japan into the same combination. It seems a little late in the day to be discussing Russia's economic needs, and still later in the day to deplore her influence in Asia after spending some four centuries in coercively persuading her to join the Asiatic rather than the European household. At the present time the world is reaping exactly what it has sown; no more, no less. If it now fears Bolshevism the remedy is, not to fight Bolsheviks, which is impossible, seeing that men will not fight any more, but rather to prepare a soil of justice and good government in which the Bolshevik seed will not grow. But what we need is men, and not measures. That is why the outlook seems so black.

None the less Mr. Spargo gives us a mass of valuable information attractively set forth. That it is somewhat irrelevant to the situation does not matter very much. We shall keep it carefully. It may become relevant to some other situation, and who shall say what the day may bring forth?

RUSSIA AS AN AMERICAN PROBLEM. By John Spargo. New York: Harper & Brothers; $2.25.

George Santayana.

The voice of Mr. Santayana is that of one crying in the wilderness, not that we may look toward a more glorious future, but toward a more beautiful and stately past. For Mr. Santayana had nothing in common with the thought of the world in which he lived. His attitude toward it was that of a gentle and melancholy contempt. He believed neither in its ideals nor its reforms. To him it was a world of barbarians, of well-intentioned savages, without either tradition or reverence or beauty. Mr. Santayana, although born a Spaniard, lived most of his life in America, but he remained wholly untouched, uninfluenced by his environment. He was always in exile, dreaming the dreams of the Latin world.

A volume of extracts from notable writings is never quite satisfactory, even when done with the skill of Logan Pearsall Smith, who worked with the collaboration of Mr. Santayana himself. But it is better than nothing, much better. For the majority of us it is all that we are likely to read, and we should certainly not lose the opportunity thereby presented.

Constantine of Greece.

Whether the public desires the truth about the war and its causes is an open question. There are those who suspect that it prefers the lie so long as the lie is interestingly told. Not that we would charge Mr. Paxton Hibben with a deliberate falsification of the facts with regard to Constantine and the Greek war. His fault seems to be that of a partisanship so strong as to blind his vision and destroy his sense of evidential values. Doubtless he believes every word he says, but that is no reason why we should.

To give an example of Mr. Hibben's methods we may quote his statement that "not even Venizelos himself pretended that the vote in question had been a vote by Greece in favor of going to war." This refers to the general election which expelled Gounaris from power and gave his vote to Venizelos. It was an election that hinged upon war, and upon nothing else. It was in answer to the direct question of war or no war with Bulgaria. The issue was as clear as the sun at noonday, and no one ever questioned it until Mr. Hibben loomed on the horizon.

Ex uno disce omnes. We need go no farther. There are other misstatements equally glaring, and they are hard to explain except on the theory of a partisanship that paralyzes the judgment. Perhaps it is well that Constantine should have an apologist, a special pleader. It is the custom. But if the popular jury is competent to its task his plea will be heard with some impatience.

CONSTANTINE I AND THE GREEK PEOPLE. By Paxton Hibben. New York: The Century Company.

The Spacious Times.

Francis Coutts has already taken his place as a poet and a maker of finely chiseled phrases, technically faultless and expressive of striking thoughts. In this volume we have him at his best. Most of his poems are devoted to the incidents of the war, but there are also many on softer themes, and some of them peculiarly graceful.

THE SPACIOUS TIMES AND OTHERS. By Francis Coutts. New York: John Lane Company.

Briefer Reviews.

With certain sad reminiscences we receive from Robert M. McBride & Co. a volume entitled "A Tankard of Ale," otherwise and sufficiently described as "an anthology of drinking songs," edited and compiled by Thomas Maynard. Whether this volume is a sort of memento mori we do not know, but we do know that we are now forbidden to drink ale, although the best legal authorities are of opinion that we may still sing.

The Thomas Y. Crowell Company has published "Uncle Squeaky's Country Store," by Nellie M. Leonard, with illustrations by Carle Michel Boog. We are inclined to wonder if children are benefited by animal stories that bear no resemblance to animal life so far as we know it.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

The Comtesse Madeleine de Bryas in "A Frenchwoman's Impressions of America," just published by the Century Company, comments as follows on the American habit of using the bathing suit: "One of our great surprises in the United States was finding how much the young generation of the country loves to get a dipping in water. Americans are an amphibious race. Swimming, diving, and plunging come to them instinctively. Never in my whole life had I met so many people in bathing costumes. It is almost a summer uniform—and truly a very becoming one. . . . In France we rarely swim except at the seaside, whereas here you almost fall into a crowded swimming pool at every step you take, in public parks, at country clubs, and very often in hotels and private houses."

Sir E. A. Wallis Budge's account in two large and handsome volumes of his travels and adventures in excavating and studying the ruins in Egypt and Mesopotamia bears the title, "By Nile and Tigris." The work has just been published in this country by E. P. Dutton & Co.

The debate which took place last May at Carnegie Hall, New York, between Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and Henry J. Allen, governor of Kansas, will be published in book form shortly by E. P. Dutton & Co.

Sir Gilbert Parker has not written a full-length novel for several years, but is appearing with "No Defense" from the Lippincott press. Working out the theme of a man's horror, which the world thinks he has lost, there are many scenes of war, mutiny, and love, and the stirring contests of wills and wits. It is said to be Parker at his best.

Before his death R. E. Vernede, author of "War Poems and Other Verses," published by the George H. Doran Company, was a well-known writer in England. Some of his most representative short stories have been collected in a volume called "Port Allington Stories and Others," which is published simultaneously with the poems.

Use of Homing Pigeons.

An entirely practical use of homing pigeons is reported from England. The inventor of the system is a butcher's son, who employs his birds regularly to carry orders from outlying districts—presumably where there are no telephones—to his father's shop. The plans work excellently. When the boy goes to collect orders he takes six of his Youth in Harley.

This is a story of New England people in a New England town of the present day, that is to say, to be more precise, of the time when Cleveland won the presidential election over Benjamin Harrison. The picture is not wholly an ingratiating one, although the intention of the author to be photographically accurate is evident enough.

Viewed as a novel, it is of the simplest kind. Stephen Quaid, fresh from collegiate honors, accepts the position of principal of the Harley Academy and finds himself at once plunged into the intimacies of small town life. Stephen, it must be confessed, is a good deal of a prig and inclined to look upon the world as created for his exploitation, a common enough failing among college graduates. When at last he reluctantly and rather condescendingly falls in love with Cynthia he finds himself in contact with ideals that are not his and with a will as strong as his own. Cynthia is uncritically religious and views Stephen's intellectual doubtings with horror. Moreover Cynthia proposes to save the world by becoming a medical missionary, a career hardly consonant with marriage. Stephen also intends to save the world, but in some way more nourishing to his self-conceit. He frets because he can give only one vote to Harrison, whereas he might control many votes as a political leader. If college graduates were one-half as clever as they think they are we should not now be in the slough of despond. Stephen and Cynthia come to terms before the end of the book and in the good old fashion by giving way to each other.

But the interest of the story is in its picture of village life. We are allowed to see it in most of its phases. There is the town meeting, the sleigh party, the G. A. R. assembly, the country fair, and the church. We are introduced to the clergyman—rather a weak brother—to the blacksmith, the artisan, and the farmer. They are all types and admirably drawn. We hope they have survived the war and its changes, with their shrewdness, their occasional unostentatious scholarship, and the strong sense of duty which was always the saving grace of a Puritanism otherwise apt to be distasteful. The author has done a worthy piece of work and in a finished way. Few other writers could have made Harley so attractive.

Insect Life.

The French naturalist, Fabre, was responsible for much of the interest now being shown in the life of the insect world. Never was there an investigator so patient, so competent, or, it may be said, so human.

The present author, J. H. Crabtree, F. R. P. S., shows many of the same qualifications for his task. In the course of his two hundred pages he makes us familiar with the great insect families and with their chief representatives. His eight chapters are apportioned among the Coleoptera, Orthoptera, Hemiptera, Diptera, Neuroptera, Myrmenoptera, Lepidoptera, and Aptera. Avoiding the obscurities of scientific terminology, he shows us how the insects live and their principal characteristics, and he does it in such a way as to convey some of his sympathies to his readers.

Literature.

Mr. MacGregor Jenkins is publisher of the Atlantic Monthly, and thus he knows something about writers and their readers, the humbug and the pretense of the "literary world." One would suppose that some bitterness might result from such experience, but there is no bitterness in Mr. Jenkins' kindly raillery. He can afford to laugh at the credulities and superstitions and enthusiasms about nothing in which most of us spend our time, and perhaps the secret of it all is that he can see the human heart lurking behind what is facetiously called the human mind, and he finds it usually wholesome. Certainly he has here written a delightful little book.

In the old mining town of Shasta, California, once the largest town in Shasta County, Western Star Lodge No. 2, Free and Accepted Masons, still has ninety-five members, though there is only one member living there. He is Grant Schroter, who is always elected secretary. The other members are scattered in all parts of the globe. Several are in South Africa. But dues are kept paid up, and every one of the ninety-five may be said to be an active member.

Forerunner of "Pussyfoot" Johnson.

Benjamin Franklin was the first "pussyfoot" to be exported from America to England (observes the Manchester Guardian). As a young man he lived for some time in London and worked as a compositor in a printing office in Little Wild Street. There he set himself to prove to his fellow-pressmen that an allowance of five pints of strong porter a day was not at all necessary to support health and strength. Franklin himself drank water only (the other compositors nicknamed him "the American Aquatic"), and yet demonstrated that he was able to carry far heavier forms and galleys of type than the beer-drinkers.

To the cry that porter was necessary as foodstuff, Franklin replied that the bodily strength furnished by the beer could only be in proportion to the solid part of the barley dissolved in the water of which the beer was composed; that there was a larger portion of flour in a penny loaf and that, consequently, if he ate this loaf and drank a pint of water he would derive more strength from it than from a pint of beer.

Franklin's breakfast, taken at his work, was "a good basin of warm gruel in which was a small slice of butter, with toasted bread and nutmeg." He managed to persuade some of his fellow-workmen to abandon a breakfast of cheese and beer in favor of the gruel of "the American Aquatic"—a conversion probably accomplished more by admiration for Franklin's natural physical strength than by any serious regard for his decidedly novel principles.

When the fox resorts to certain tricks to outwit and delay the hound (if he ever consciously does so), says John Burroughs, he exercises a kind of intelligence—the lower form which we call cunning, and he is prompted to this by an instinct of self-preservation.

"MADAME SAND."

This is the title of a wise, kind, half satirizing, half sympathizing, immensely comprehending, and wholly brilliant play by Philip Moeller. This author's name is more particularly connected with the Washington Square Players, of whose theatrical organization he was one of the founders. His abilities found sympathetic expression for some time in one-act plays for the Washington Square Players. His work commanded immediate attention, and now he has developed into a writer of full-length plays. "Madame Sand" was written for Mrs. Fiske, who describes it in a foreword to the printed copy of the piece as an "incurably brilliant and funny play." She laughed and laughed as she read it, and with what additional delight she must have laughed to recognize points, places, situations, sayings in the play to which her peculiar and individual talent could do full justice. The play had its first representation in Baltimore in October, 1917, and the great success that was inevitable was then begun.

And we saw Mrs. Fiske during her recent visit here in "Mis' Nelly of N'Orleans!" A shallow, twaddly affair, built only for an ephemeral success. True, it gave a certain theatrical opportunity to Mrs. Fiske, and true again, she took advantage of it with such grace and charm and vivacity as almost to persuade us that the play had merit. But it didn't really, except of the most superficial and artificial kind. To read "Madame Sand" is to groan and groan again over our lost opportunity. No matter how much we may appreciate the printed play, a play was written to be acted. Mrs. Fiske is preëminently the actress on the American stage to breathe the breath of life into this strictly natural enjoyer of life, this sedulous follower of irresistible impulses, George Sand. Perhaps a quotation from Mrs. Fiske, very delightfully expressed, will help to freshen up the colors of that image of George Sand that we have built up from the comments of her amazed contemporaries, from the shrewd, perceptive, and analytic criticisms of later writers, such as Henry James, and from her own five or more scores of books. "This creature of a thousand colors," she says, "grande dame and Bohemian, gamine and daughter of kings, soubrette and philosopher, pagan and religious, hausfrau and mad lover, everyday hard worker and impassioned dreamer, tragedy queen and imp of mischief, sibyl and 'big child,' everything that lives and burns and flames in man or woman, George Sand, the generous, the kind, the simple."

It is plain that Mrs. Fiske attained to a heavenly state of enthusiasm when she plunged into George Sandiana after reading Mr. Moeller's play, and that it was in that mood that she started out to interpret to her public this woman of a dozen amours that set all Europe agog; this many-sided creator of the pure, the lofty-minded, the spiritually radiant Consuelo.

For Mr. Moeller attacked his task of putting George Sand into a play with an emancipation of spirit, a full comprehension of the immense and enjoyable contradictions in Mme. Sand's nature, and a determination to reveal them in a play entirely devoid of historic conventionality and tedious salaams toward genius which has resulted in giving it humanness, originality, and fine yet abounding humor.

It is quite a remarkable play, for an American; a typical New Yorker, one supposes, for the author was born (in 1880), reared, and educated in the City of New York. His play, however, is worthy of a brilliant European. It does not read like European impressions filtered through an American mind, but is essentially European throughout in atmosphere and expression; except, perhaps, that his American up-bringing assisted him in approaching the subject of "ridiculous, priceless George" with a fuller perception of the humorous possibilities inherent in her character and in the events of her life than if he had been reared in conventional England, in France that will persist in being sentimental and respectful toward the passing amour, or in Italy, which, in spite of its glowing skies, its purple mountains, and its Finimistic D'Annunzio, has a hard pan of practicality underneath its romantic exterior.

Mr. Moeller depicts George Sand in that hectic flush of her career when she is kidnapping Alfred de Musset and bearing him off to Italy. She loves him madly—and the copy he yields her. Emotion is her god, but in the midst of her most fervent apostrophes George, who dares to be natural even when she is posing, pauses to commend a phrase and jot it down for literary use, or to relish the cream of onion soup and comment approvingly on its flavor; for George is a gourmet and a culinary as well as a literary genius.

Heine and Buloz—the latter the editor of the Revue des Deux Mondes and George Sand's literary godfather and approving profligate on her literary genius—form a sort of Greek chorus, and their amused, semi-sympathetic, semi-satiric comments on George and her love affairs are rich and rare reading. "I've signed with her for five years," says the well-satisfied Buloz, who is well aware that each fresh liaison means a new novel; "my subscriptions have been falling off. I needed just her sort of copy to hoost them. Nothing sells like love."

Heine—Except a liaison.
Buloz—Exactly.

In the midst of their artistic jargon and glittering epigrams are interspersed the literal and common-sensical remarks of Rosalie, the cook, who says practically to Buloz when she hears Mme. Sand's cah in the courtyard: "Don't let her start writing again till dinner is served. . . ."

Heine—But if Calliope descends—
Rosalie—Another of those actor people? Put her out and remember the omelet.

This gem of an act is followed by another, perhaps an equally good one, in which the lovers, now considerably cooled off and disillusioned concerning the other's desirability as a companion, are in Venice, and George is veering rapidly toward her famous affair with De Musset's Italian physician, Dr. Pagello. Pagello is rather literal, but innocent, and as beautiful as the marble faun. De Musset is prosaically and unromantically ill. George Sand nurses him, and while he slumbers George the incorrigible makes ardent love to the beautiful but prosaic Pagello, an expert on gall-stones, who says: "Even my most serious case—a fat Turk dying of typhus—didn't interest me. Whilst I bled him, I thought of you."

The delightful fecundity of the author, his warm, eager, and ready imagination, the spirituality yet human earthiness of his humor are shown by the creation of another character, Lucrezia Violente, the jealous mistress of Pagello, who comes to snatch her beloved from the invading marauder. She interrupts a transcendental scene in which George beautifully bids good-by to Alfred de Musset and beautifully takes a semi-loverlike, semi-maternal possession of the ox-eyed young Pagello by hursting in upon them, a simple, fiery, elemental creature who, with a stiletto twitching in her fingers, cries furiously to the imperishable George, smoking a long black cigar and dressed in coat and trousers: "Who are you? What are you? You crazy woman! You woman in breeches dressed like that!"

George—What a fascinating personality. (And she goes over to her desk and brings over some manuscript paper and a pen.)

Lucrezia—I spit at you. . . I dig my nails in your heart.

And when Lucrezia the forsaken, stammering with rage, says to Pietro, her faithless lover, "I love you. I hate you. I love you. I speak your name when I sleep; when I go to the well the water says Pietro, and I drink, and drink, and drink."

George (writing as quickly as she can)—Charming, charming. Do you mind repeating that? How many times did you say drink?

Here, however, the author introduces a false note, for George, although she showed a conspicuous lack of humor, would, I believe, in her deep sympathy for love, even though it were the love of a rival, have been incapable of that unwomanly lack of sympathy. But at times the comedy, delightful though it always is, betrays too great a suggestion of artificiality and arrangement.

The last act shows George tired of Pagello. His literalness hores her. She but repeats the mood of Alfred in the second act, who confides to his brother, when he sees with a gay and relieved spirit that George is ready to desert him, "I can't hear her about me. She's like a noisy old clock that can't stop ticking. . . . She writes as a cow gives milk. All she has to do is to jerk at her mind. She has the soul of a bourgeoise."

This, indeed, is what Mr. Moeller shows throughout the play. George is a very earthy, onion-eating, cigar-smoking, man-appropriating, masculine-featured, endlessly-talking person who probably in life smelled steadily of garlic. This conception of her we may gather from the play. Also that her "itching pen" perpetually turned heart experiences to account by reeling off copy. George invokes God and the Bible as often as William Hohenzollern used to do. She has an insatiable desire for fresh experiences, and when one love fades away and another is born, she says with a noble and commanding tone which hypnotizes the mother of Alfred, the mistress of Pagello, and her own friends, even the cynical Heine, "Love has spoken," or "Life has spoken," or "What must be, must be," or "It is over, over. Our poor romance is ended. Time has written finite." But she voices her real belief, the belief of the George Sand who staggered all Europe by her profound indifference to conventions, "There is no such thing as fate. . . . Fate is the death-cry of the coward. I at least am mistress of my destiny."

And yet in "Consuelo" and "The Countess of Rudolstadt" this being who seemed so complex, but who was really as natural as the imperfectly civilized always are, wrote a novel—for the two are really one—in which the pure and perfect constancy of a noble and elevated nature was sounded as the inspiring key-note of the romance.

"Always," says Wanda in the concluding pages of "The Countess of Rudolstadt," in blessing the reunited lovers, "is the most impassioned word of lovers! . . . Eternity is the ideal of love, as it is the ideal of faith."

In "Madame Sand," when the mother of De Musset says, "I have learned to respect tradition," George replies, quite in harmony with the circumstances of her life, "Need is the only tradition I acknowledge."

George Sand, who took her pen name from the first syllable of her first illicit lover's (Jules Sandeau) name, had a large strain of masculinity in her make-up. Many a man is no greater rebel against conventionalities than she; only he hides his lapses and the world makes no fuss. Without beauty, or daintiness, or delicacy, or real refinement, without spirituality, one might think, were it not for many passages in her many books, this woman blazed a triumphant path through the hearts of famous men who had but to put out their hands to pick and choose.

But her capacious heart was full of love for humanity. She belonged to the ranks of those who in the trouble mid-years of the nineteenth century, when a wave of democracy swept over Europe and madly sought to submerge beneath its crest the cruel and mighty oppressors in palaces and on thrones, gave her heart, her time, her influence, her eloquence to help the cause of the oppressed.

That side of George Sand we are not made acquainted with in Mr. Moeller's play. But instead of presenting her to us as a literary lay figure he has given her a warm and persuasive vitality. He makes such of us as have an open mind forgive her sins against the conventions as did many of her contemporaries because her heart was so big and warm that her pen was ready in the cause of the millions who had been crushed and broken by the power of feudalism, he will help us to realize because, after seeing or reading the play, we will feel an irresistible surge to become reacquainted with his heroine through the medium of her books.

Some of them are wild, impossible romanticism. Some seem to be absent from the libraries. I have never succeeded in getting hold of "Elle et Lui," in which George Sand gave her version of the row in which her famous affair with Chopin—whose beginning is just indicated in the play—terminated with a clamor that reached the ears of all Europe. But one can generally find "Consuelo" and the sequel to it, "De Mauprat," "The Sandman," and perhaps one or two of the exceedingly antiquated and diffuse stories of peasant life.

"Consuelo" is, of course, her most brilliant

Watering the Dahlias

Just now the San Francisco dahlia grower is "in his clement," for this is the season of the dahlia exhibitions for which our city is famous.

Perhaps you would like to raise dahlias, but fear that your water bill would be prohibitive.

You have been told that dahlias need a great deal of irrigation, that the sandy soil in which they thrive best absorbs lots of water.

We have looked into this matter of the cost of water for dahlias, carefully analyzing the bills paid by an expert grower who has one of the prize dahlia gardens of San Francisco.

This dahlia garden is watered at an average monthly cost of four mills per square yard!

At that rate, water for a garden space of 100 square yards—the ordinary home garden—costs about 40 cents a month.

Without being too precise in your use of water, you can easily keep your dahlia garden growing for 50 cents a month.

But to do that you must not waste water—you must use it with intelligent care.

For dahlias, as for other flowers, too much water is as bad as too little.

Use enough water on your dahlias, but don't wash the fertility out of the soil.

ork, its continuance into the pages of "The Countess of Rudolstadt" showing the same facility in presenting vari-colored and romantically interesting and well-informed views of the courts of Europe. Emotionalist though he was, George Sand was also an intellectualist, and it was this union in her character, as well as her intense love of romance, which lent such a strong and, in the best of them, a still abiding charm to her romances.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Henry Watterson was present at the death of John Quincy Adams in the United States Capitol. In his autobiography he tells of it: "It was fond of going to the Capitol and of paying amateur page in the House, of which my father had been a member and where he had many friends, though I was never officially a page. There was in particular a little old bald-headed gentleman who was good to me and would put his arm about me and roll with me across the rotunda to the library of Congress and get me books to read. I was not so young as not to know that he was an ex-President of the United States and to realize the meaning of it. He had been the oldest member of the House when my father was the youngest. He was John Quincy Adams. By chance I was on the floor of the House when he fell in his place and followed him excited and tearful throng when they bore him into the Speaker's room, kneeling by the side of the sofa with an improvised fan and crying as if my heart would break."

The mint of the Czecho-Slovak Republic, located at Kromnice, which was partly destroyed by the Hungarians, is being reconstructed, remodeled, and reequipped. New printing machines are expected soon, and after being installed the first Czecho-Slovak coins will be minted. A recent product of the mint is a plaque with a portrait of President Masaryk in honor his seventieth birthday anniversary.

The Curran Theatre.

No comedy that has been produced on the New York stage the past season has won greater critical praise or achieved more popularity than Rachel Barton Butler's Harvard prize comedy, "Mamma's Affair," which Oliver Morosco will offer at the Curran Theatre for a two weeks' engagement starting Sunday night. Of equal importance is the fact that it will be played by Oliver Morosco's original and now famous all-star cast, including Effie Shannon, Robert Edeson, Amelia Bingham, Katherine Kaelred, Ida St. Leon, George LeGuere, and Little Billy.

"Mamma's Affair" has to do with the strenuous efforts of a hypochondriac mother to be constantly ill and under the attention of a physician; a condition which requires the entire attention of her young daughter and which finally results in the latter nearly becoming a real patient. The mother never travels without a list of doctors in each town she visits. She finally calls in the wrong physician—or rather a real physician and the right one—who, quickly realizing the situation, starts out to cure the mother and save the daughter's health by a most amusing treatment of pure mental browbeating. He succeeds in a most laughable and satisfactory fashion and incidentally develops and wins a bride in a most fascinating and most exciting romance.

Individually the members of this all-star cast have never been seen to greater advantage during their long and successful stage careers, and they realize all of the limitless advantages offered them. This combination of players in this prize comedy affords one of the really important attractions of the current season. Matinees are announced for Labor Day and Admission Day in addition to the usual Saturday matinee.

The Orpheum.

Emma Haig comes to headline the Orpheum bill Sunday. This is her second tour of the Orpheum route. In this instance she brings an entirely new routine of steps, all welded into a dance series entitled "Playtime." Richard W. Keene and Mildred Brown are her associates in the act, which is said to be an expensively staged and lavishly costumed one.

Gifted with undisputed ability, magnetism, and grace, Emma Haig has kept herself in constant favor by continually creating new dances. It is claimed her routine this year is the most fetching she yet has accomplished.

Bob Nelson and Frank Cronin, comedians, will sing and converse in a skit entitled "Smiles." Their bit is so named for its effect on audiences.

Jack Trainor will be seen in Jack Lait's new skit, "Help," based on the ludicrous points in the present labor shortage. The sketch is not intended to solve problems nor teach morals. Its purpose is to promote fun.

Charles Kenna, who recognized the street fakir as excellent comedy material, will deliver his now famous gasoline torch monologue.

Edward Marshall will bring into play his faculty as a cartoonist, portrait painter, and sketch artist. Marshall originally hailed from San Francisco.

Toots Davis and Bert Chadwick, genuine blackface comedy men, called the "jail house boys," and Challen Keke, wireists, also are booked. Eddie Vogt in "The Love Shop," with Harry and Grace Ellsworth, the musical extravaganza of the current bill, hold over.

The Columbia Theatre.

Maude Fulton's latest play, "Enter Mary Brown," will have its San Francisco premiere at the Columbia Theatre this Monday night, September 6th. It is peppered with laughs of the famous Fulton brand, the story of the play being as crowded with twists as the O. Henry type of tale. The new play describes the doings of the newly-rich Boggs family and the appearance in their home of Mary Jones, a maid. This particular Mary is a trim and pretty miss, and the way in which she revolutionizes the affairs of the Boggs family keeps the action a-going with great speed. The production will be under the personal direction of the author-actress and the cast is to include Elwyn Harvey, a distinguished English actress; Lucille Webster, last seen here in "A Prince There Was"; Frank K. Wallace, Jerome Sheldon, Ivy Darien, Charles Gregg, John Fee, Hugh Knox, Anne McNaughton, and Erma Melville. Matinees are announced for Wednesday, Admission Day (Thursday), and Saturday.

The Alcazar Theatre.

"Parlor, Bedroom and Bath," opening at the Alcazar next Sunday matinee, is a whirl of pleasant absurdities in harmony with the holiday spirit. There will be holiday matinees on Monday (Labor Day) and Thursday (Admission Day). The original spoken comedy is by C. W. Bell and Mark Swan. Its zone of laughter, since A. H. Woods gave it a solid year's run in New York, has grown to embrace all America, although it has never been acted at the Alcazar. Inez Ragan as the pajamaed bride and Dudley Ayres as the festive man about town have played these parts with abundant success in the East. A very interesting personality is that of the brilliant comedienne Isabelle Fletcher, specially engaged to appear in the rôle of the eccentric woman society reporter, that made Florence Moore famous. Miss Fletcher was the idol of Oakland a few seasons ago, when she was leading woman of Ye Liberty stock company; she has never appeared in this city. Other participants in "Parlor, Bedroom and Bath" include Emily Pinter, Gladys Emmons, Dorothy Bartley, Brady Kline, Ben Erway, Rafael Brunetto, Al Cunningham, Billy Lewis, and Frederic Green.

Rachel Crothers' recent New York comedy success, "39 East," will have its first Coast presentation September 12th. It is a delightful romance covering a single day in a New York boarding-house of "the better class," with a picturesque episode in Central Park. Its vogue at the New York Adelphi led to a later transfer to the Booth Theatre, where it ran for months.

Scotti Opera Company.

Lovers of music are interested in the fact that of all the luxuries of life grand opera alone is to be heard in San Francisco at the Exposition Auditorium for 28½ per cent. less than it cost fourteen years ago. The last time a Metropolitan organization was heard here was when Conried brought a company in April, 1906. Both Caruso and Antonio Scotti were members of that company and the best seats were sold for $7, with the lower-priced seats in proportion. On October 4th the Scotti Grand Opera Company will open a season of grand opera for one week with the highest-priced tickets selling at $5 and the lower-priced tickets ranging down to $1.50. With Scotti, who, by the way, is the only survivor of the famous Conried organization, aside from Caruso, now singing at the Metropolitan, will be one hundred and fifty principals, musicians, chorus, and ballet from New York's famous opera house.

Impresario Frank W. Healy, under whose local management the season is to be given, found it possible to fix these prices by adopting the quantity production idea of big industrial enterprises. By using the Exposition Auditorium Healy is able to have a larger number of persons hear opera than is possible in any other indoor theatre, and this notwithstanding that the seating capacity of the Auditorium will be greatly reduced by reason of building a special and spacious stage and providing an orchestra pit for sixty-five members of the orchestra. The musicians will respond to the batons of Gennaro Papi, leading conductor at the Metropolitan, Carlo Peroni, and Wilfred Pelletier.

It was the desire of Healy to have the season extend over two weeks, but Scotti declared this impossible for the reason that the members of the company must be in New York on November 1st to prepare for the opening of the Metropolitan season. The tour opened in St. Paul and is to close at Montreal.

The repertory is as follows: Monday evening, October 4th, "La Bohème" (Puccini); Tuesday evening, "L'Oracolo" (Leoni) and "Pagliacci" (Leoncavallo); Wednesday evening, "Faust" (Gounod); Thursday evening, "La Tosca" (Puccini); Friday evening, "Il Trovatore" (Verdi); Saturday afternoon, "Madame Butterfly" (Puccini); Saturday evening, "L'Oracolo" (Leoni) and "Cavalleria Rusticana" (Mascagni), and Sunday afternoon, "La Bohème" (Puccini).

The stars of the company are: Sopranos—Florence Easton, prima donna assoluta; Marie Sundelius, lyric soprano; Francesca Peralta, dramatic soprano, and Anna Roselle and Ruth Miller; tenors—Orville Harrold, Morgan Kingston, Mario Chamlee, and Giordano Paltrinieri; mezzo sopranos—Jeanne Gordon, Mary Kent, and Dorio Fernanda; baritones—Antonio Scotti, Millo Picco, Mario Laurenti, Greek Evans, and Louis D'Angelo; basses—Léon Rother, Giovanni Martino, and Palo Ananian; conductors—Gennaro Papi, Carlo Peroni, and Wilfred Pelletier; stage director—Armando Agnini; and the business affairs are in the hands of Carl F. many years the commercial genius of the Metropolitan.

The sale of season tickets, which closed last Saturday, was much heavier than had been expected, and during the week the sale of single seats has drawn an almost continuous stream of people to the box-office at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, Kearny and Sutter Streets. Frank W. Healy is filling mail orders at his office in the Kohler & Chase Building.

One of the big New York newspapers desired quite a few years ago to get hold of some short fiction stories for its Sunday issue. It is related that Don Seitz, manager of the paper, took upon himself the task of selecting this fiction. He sent to a literary agent and asked him for a lot of stories by writers who were not so well known that their prices would be too high. In a little while Seitz found himself facing a stack of a great many score of soiled manuscripts which had been rejected by various magazines, and all by authors who were practically unknown. Seitz began to go through them, so the story is related in New York, paying no attention to names, but making a separate pile of those which excited his interest. After several hours of this kind of work he had a large pile of goats on one side of him and a smaller pile of the sheep on the other. Then he went through the sheep a second time to see if among these more meritorious manuscripts he could find the name of any celebrated author. He found that, by chance, all the stories he had picked out there were the work of just two authors—both at that time unknown to fame—Rex Beach and O. Henry.

It was only to be supposed that our newspapers should give large space to the opinions upon marriage recently proclaimed by the young people forming the sociology class at the Ohio State University. For what subject could be better adapted to the vacuous minds of the great co-educated public? Empires might pass away and cause hardly a ripple of interest. But the convictions of thirty-one "sociologists" on the topic of marriage might not be passed over so easily.

It seems there are certain essentials to a happy marriage. We were somewhat of the same opinion ourselves, although after much deliberation and even experimentation we have been quite unable to say what they are. We have seen a good many "ideal" marriages in our time, marriages based on the soundest of rules and upon the most approved formulas, eugenist marriages, prophylactic marriages, and all the other varieties based on study, calculation, and intelligence, and so far as we can remember they have all ended in the divorce court. The only actually happy marriages seem to be those perpetrated in defiance of all the rules of discretion, the apparently hopeless union of inconsistencies and even antagonisms, in other words the marriage of unreasoning impulse. Whenever we hear of a marriage as being "so suitable" we foresee calamity in the offing. And whenever we hear of the marriage of calculation, eugenist, financial, or other, we know that the calamity is close at hand.

These young sociologists arranged the qualifications for marriage under the headings of essential, highly valued, moderately valued, and slightly valued. Among essential physical qualifications were identity of race, sound family stock, good health, and physical attractiveness. Similarity of age was not essential, but it was considered of high value. Among the essential mental traits were affection, intelligence, and a desire for and love of children. Both sexes thought that a love of music was more important than a love of literature or art. High value was placed on a similarity of education, which should consist of at least a high-school training. Sincerity, honesty, fair-mindedness, truthfulness, and wholesomeness in thought and actions were generally considered as essentials, whereas religious ideals found only a secondary place among the high values. Curiously enough, most of the women students demanded a "good provider," and most of the men students gave a similar priority to a capacity for self-support on the part of the wife. It would be interesting to know how many of these students are married. Presumably none of them, which of course would free their judgment from all taint of bias or prejudice.

Perhaps the best way to study the essentials of happy matrimony is to consider the cases of our friends who are happily married if we have any, which is extremely doubtful. Not that we shall thereby arrive at any conclusion except the conclusion that there is no conclusion. Searching for rules we shall find none, and we may even wonder why incompatibility should so often be urged as a reason for divorce, whereas it seems on the contrary to be among the best of all reasons for marriage. Marriage seems to be one of those things of which not even the youngest among us knows anything. No one ever yet elaborated a theory of happiness in marriage that is not demonstrably falsified by the facts. None the less we shall doubtless go on trying. Our sociology classes must busy themselves about something.

It seems a pity, because the whole world is now and always has been persuaded that we ought to get married. The very absence of reliable guidance seems to favor the theory that we ought to marry impulsively and improvidently. The French government has just put a special tax on bachelors. America and England grant income-tax exemptions to the married, although not even the smallest of wives could be maintained for many weeks on the exemption. Bachelors in ancient Greece were placed under legal disabilities, and in Athens no man was allowed to command an army unless he was married and had children. No wonder Athens fell. The Spartan bachelors were not allowed to mingle with young women in the athletic games, and sometimes they were even compelled to parade bearing some special mark of infamy.

A writer in the New York Tribune says that the ancient insistence upon marriage was the cause of the prevalence of love charms and philtres, a practice that has somewhat gone out of use, but that we may have to revive. Why not? Doctors are telling us that falling in love is due to a microbe which presumably can be cultivated. In that case we should have a love philtre, although it would not be called by that name. Personally we prefer the ancient ones, although we are not actually in need of anything of the sort. Both Lucullus and Lucretius were killed by love potions, which may therefore be considered as eminently successful. Caius Caligula received a love potion from his wife and became violently insane.

Some of these love potions were of an interesting composition which ought to be made known. There was a juice extracted from stewed lizards that had high repute. Calves' brains also were used, and this seems to be sound common sense. A somewhat difficult prescription contained the bones of the left side of a toad that had been eaten by ants. The bones from the right side have a very different effect, so that it is well to be careful. These hints are merely thrown out in passing. In conjunction with an increased income-tax exemption they might have their value.

Up in the Bronx (says the New York Times) is a barber whose claim to uniqueness in his profession is credited by his patrons.

A newcomer in that part of the city walked into this barber's shop the other day at the noon hour and found only two "tonsorial artists" on duty. One was shaving a customer. The other was well along in years, but proved as spry as any youngster in preparing the chair toward which he motioned the new patron.

"I want my hair cut," said the man, "and I want it cut the way I like it—close in the back and enough left to part easily in front."

Without a word, not even a "Yes, sir," the old barber removed the headrest, spread over the customer the usual striped covering, "wadded" his neck with the usual cotton batting and began cutting the hair with the usual miniature "mowing machine."

About the time the new customer expected to see the barber drop the clippers and start using a pair of shears the man who was being shaved addressed a remark to the barber. It did not really call for a reply, but the stranger was rather surprised that the barber made no reply.

By the time he had decided that the old man was either actually dumb or, even rarer, a non-talkative barber, he suddenly realized that his hair was being cut in front and that the barber was still using the clippers, though holding up the hair with a comb as customary when using scissors. It was evident that his hair was not being shorn down to the scalp and so the patron said nothing. But he watched and waited for the scissors.

Finally the barber laid down the clippers, but instead of picking up the scissors he held up a handglass, and, still without a word, indicated that he was ready for the verdict on his work.

"It looks all right," said the customer, "and now I want a shave and my mustache trimmed."

Silently the old barber put back the headrest, prepared the lathe, and finished the shaving job.

"Now for the scissors!" the patron said to himself as the barber began smoothing out the mustache. The barber trimmed that mustache to a nicety with the clippers, and when, still without speaking, he handed the check to the customer he had not once touched a pair of scissors.

"Well," exclaimed the customer, "you're a wonder. In all my long life I never before saw a barber cut hair and trim a mustache without scissors, to say nothing of not once opening his mouth."

Then the customer got another surprise. "Yes," said the barber supposed to be dumb, "and I'm the only man in the United States that can do it."

A Louisiana lady writes George Weston, author of "Mary Minds Her Business," inquiring whether he was a man or a woman. In reply the author wrote: "I sing bass, smoke a pipe, swear when excited, wear homespun trousers, shave every morning, and find it hard to keep my neck from turning when Beauty passes by. I vote for Presidents, like to gossip, buy No. 9 shoes, walk with long strides, wear a mustache, whistle, whittle, sit in the sun, talk politics, and once even tried to chew tobacco, although (I hasten to add) without the least success. I can also walk on my hands for as long as seven steps." This should have been conclusive.

When one reads of Duse living in poverty and Sarah Bernhardt writing a serial of her life to hold off the wolf, one wonders about those $1000-a-night salary stories.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Mr. Higginson had been away from home for a week and on his return found that burglars had visited the house during his absence and, although one had been wounded, they had succeeded in getting away. "And so you shot a hurglar while alone and unprotected?" he said to his wife. "You are a brave little woman! What became of him?" "The other man carried him off," she replied. "The other man?" he asked. "Yes," she said, "the one I aimed at."

Father's present to little Johnny on his eighth birthday was a beautiful book. "And if you find any new words in it," said he rashly, "don't forget to ask me, sonny." The cross-examination soon began. "Father, what is an optimist?" burst out Johnny, before he had read to the foot of the page. "Er-an optimist!" replied father, thinking hard. "Oh, an optimist, my son, is an Englishman who buys goods from a Jew, hoping to sell them at a profit to a Scotchman."

Mr. Bryan doesn't believe the Republicans will save the country. "Whichever side wins, I'm afraid will act as did the new maid. The new maid was entirely makeshift, and the mistress bore with her patiently at first. But on the third day she placed a very unclean dinner-plate on the table and patience broke down. 'Really, Mary, you might at least see that the plates are clean.' 'Well, mum,' Mary rejoined. 'I owns to them thumb marks, but that dried mustard was there afore I came.'"

"Poor Nipsley! It was a terrible blow to him." "Nipsley? I haven't heard about it." "What's the matter?" "It was very sudden. He's all broken up. I saw him yesterday, and he told me he didn't know how he could get along without her. To tell you the truth, I wouldn't have believed before it happened that he'd have taken it so hard. He hasn't been able to attend to business or to—" "Say, for heaven's sake! Why don't you tell a fellow about it? What's the old boy's trouble?" "His wife's dead." "Oh, Lord! I thought from the way you spoke that somebody must have come along and hired his typewriter girl away from him."

The story is told of a dowager whose wealth and education were of exceedingly recent acquisition. According to her accounts the trip around the world that she had completed had been socially most successful. Some of her friends were questioning her about the places of interest that she had visited. "Did you see the Dardanelles?" asked one. "And the Himalayas?" inquired another. "Why, certainly," replied the dowager; "I dined with them both in Paris."

A clever team driver boasted of the sureness of his aim with his whip lash, declaring he would reach with his whip any object named. "See the top of the left ear of that horse? I'll reach it." And he did, exactly. Next there was a dry leaf in a hedge surrounded by green leaves. "I'll touch that," he said, and again he was successful. Then came the stranger's turn. "Can you reach the hornet's nest?" he asked. "No, sir," answered the team driver. "I can not—that hornet's nest is not an object; it's an organization."

The third hitch man and the no-striper had been sent out on patrol duty in No Man's Land with strict instructions to get the sniper who had been worrying the company all day. Finally the offending Jerry was located among the branches of a tree. With the utmost coolness the old-timer took careful aim, fired, and—missed. The recruit, with teeth chattering, wobbled his rifle to his shoulder, pulled the trigger, and the sniper fell to the ground dead. Disgustedly the veteran of three enlistments watched the performance. "No wonder you got him," he growled. "You aimed all over the tree."

He was very affable and free with his opinions, was this young Englishman, but that was about all he was free with. To the man who had carried his bag to the countryside station he had given one whole penny. Notwithstanding the forlorn look on the man's face, he still continued to chat in an easy manner. "I shall never forget," he continued, "the splendor of the scenery when I was in Switzerland. It was an education to see the sun rise, tipping the little blue hills with gold—" "Ah!" interrupted the men who had toiled with his bag. "Them 'ills was luckier than me, weren't they?"

Johnny paid his first visit to a farm the other day. All his life he had lived in the heart of a great city, and when he suddenly came in sight of a haystack he stopped and gazed earnestly at what appeared to him as a new brand of architecture. "Say, Mr. Smith," he remarked to the farmer, pointing to the haystack, "why don't they have doors and windows in it?" "Doors and windows!" smiled the farmer. "That aint a house, Johnny; that's hay." "Don't try to josh me, Mr. Smith!" was the scornful rejoinder. "Don't you suppose I know that hay don't grow in humps like that?"

Young Brown had caught the craze for muscular development, through which, like teething, mumps, and measles, most young men must go. Moreover, he caught it badly. He was always prating to his friends about some new method, or apparatus, or system, or something. At last the worm turned. One youthful companion, after listening patiently to a lengthy discourse on how exercises made people more healthy, increased their strength, and lengthened their lives, turned on Brown. "Look here, old man," he said, "how about our ancestors? They didn't use muscle-developers, did they?" Brown looked thoughtful for a moment and then his face brightened. "Well," he retorted, "and where are they now? All dead!"

Governor Parker of Louisiana was advocating woman suffrage at a New Orleans luncheon. "Certain shell-back reactionaries," he said, "claim that votes for women means race suicide. That is nonsense. It is the men, not the women, who are responsible for race suicide as a rule. Man's attitude towards babies is brought out by the lament of little Willie, who hung around school after hours one day in an unaccountable manner. So the teacher said to him: 'Go home, Willie. Willie, why don't you go home?' 'I don't want to go home,' said Willie sullenly. 'You don't? Why not?' 'Because there's another new baby at our house.' 'Another new baby! And is that anything to sulk about? For shame, Willie! You ought to be glad that—' 'Well, I aint glad!' roared Willie. 'Pop'll blame me. I know it. He blames me for everything.'"

THE MERRY MUSE.

Come Into the Garden.

Come into the garden, Maud,
The morning breeze is blowing;
Come into the garden, Maud,
The early spuds need hoeing;
And where should be the useful pea
The mullen stalks are growing.
Come into the garden, Maud,
And prune the luscious sasses;
Anoint the bean with paris green
And pull the greedy grasses;
Besmear the 'smug potato bug
With sulphur and molasses.

Come into the garden, Maud,
Reduce your figure weeding;
Come into the garden, Maud,
The whole wide world needs feeding;
Change faldralers for overalls,
Forget your bestest beau,
And come into the garden, Maud,
To juggle with the hoe.
—Blanche F. Gile in Judge.

The Home Seekers.

Said he: "We'll take Apartment Ten,
Although it's small and in the rear;
I rather think we'll like it when We've lived there for about a year."
But—just to show how hard it is To please some folks that come in here—
I saw her put her hand in his
And speak so low it reached no ear:
"I want to buy some twilight and a leafy little lane
To run to greet him in each night when he comes home again."

In normal tones she said, "I trust
No one will build across the way.
You see we feel we simply must Have lots of light throughout the day."
And though her husband smiled and signed
The lease, and wrote a check to pay
The first month's rent; if I'm not blind
I'll swear I heard that fellow say:

"I want to buy some firelight for a lovely lady's hair.
And oh, what is the price of little castles in the air?"
—Life.

Distinguishing "Mister" from "Esquire."

"Mister" or "Esquire"? For that matter, one might ask, "Why either?" The answer is that either is a courtesy title, whether in this country or in England; and courtesy is a good thing, easy to bestow, churlish to withhold. There is a fancy that the address, "Thomas Smith, Esq.," carries a little more honor than "Mr. Thomas Smith," but in America "esquire" means no more than "mister," if either really means anything.

Matthew Arnold explained the difference in the English custom by an assertion which signified that a gentleman, or any one who is engaged in a "gentlemanly" occupation, is denominated "esquire," but that the tradesman is entitled to nothing better than "mister." Nevertheless the Englishman is not always sure of himself in making the distinction. One of the London papers amused itself with the experience of a correspondent who found that the railway companies vouchsafe to those passengers only who care sufficiently about their social standing to be holders of first-class season tickets the honor of "esquire."

On one day when the correspondent held a first-class ticket he received a letter from the company addressed "esquire." But on the next day, when he transferred his patronage to second class, he was humiliated to find himself relegated to the common crowd known as "Mr."

This gentleman gives a burlesque etymology of the word. When the Conqueror came over in 1066, those of his retinue who could afford cushions to sit on at an audience were known as "esquires," or "esquatters," and those who had to sit on hard wooden seats were called "misters."

The real derivation of the word is, as every one will remember, from "escuyer," old French for "shield-bearer," and so came to be applied to the chief retainers of knights. When the feudal days passed the word remained.

"Piedmont Estates" Homesites

— IN —

The East Bay's Finest Residential Park

IN BEAUTIFUL PIEDMONT, commanding a most magnificent view of San Francisco Bay and the Marin County Hills.
THIS SUPERB residential Park is situated on the Sunkist slope of the Fashionable Piedmont District and is absolutely protected from disagreeable winds.
THIS PARK has been subdivided so the contours of the land give each homesite a natural setting. This will appeal to appreciative people, who desire something different from the ordinary flat level land without inspiration or artistic merit.
ONLY FIFTEEN of these remarkable homesites of from one to four acres; each one furnishing a most picturesque location for a home of dignity and refinement.
OVER ONE MILLION DOLLARS of Piedmont's finest homes adjacent to Piedmont Estates.
CAREFULLY RESTRICTED to home costing from $10,000 upward.
THIS UNIQUE LOCATION, the splendid plans prepared for the development of this beautiful residential Park, prepared by landscape Engineers of note, and the perfect building restrictions combine to make this a home place of distinctiveness and individuality.

Marvels of a Real Soundproof Room.

It is said that the Physiological Institute of the University of Utrecht possesses what is probably the most remarkable room in the world, a chamber about seven and a half feet square, which is claimed to be absolutely noiseless, as far as the entrance of sounds from outside is concerned.

It is on the top story of a laboratory building and is an inside room, but is so arranged that it can be ventilated and inundated with sunshine. The walls, floor, and ceiling each consist of half a dozen layers of different substances, with air spaces and interstices filled with sound-deadening materials.

Some persons when in the room experience a peculiar sensation in the ears. While every effort has been made to exclude sounds that are not wanted, of course the object of constructing this singular room was to experiment with phenomena connected with sound. Some of the sounds employed are made in the room itself; others are introduced from outside by means of a copper tube, which is plugged with lead when not in use.

Diogenes, lighted lantern in hand, tramping through the streets of Athens looking for an honest man, had his trouble for his pains, and this, according to current report, is about as far as dress manufacturers are progressing nowadays in their quest for the "perfect thirty-six." This very essential adjunct to every complete dressmaking establishment is said to be rapidly becoming extinct as far as dress models go. Authorities on the subject incline to the view that the dearth of perfect thirty-sixes is only another of the ill effects of the war and the kaleidoscopic changes in economic conditions since the signing of the armistice. Whatever may be the cause, the fact remains that the national organization of dress manufacturers has sent out a hurry call for models as near the "perfect thirty-six" standard as possible.

The Late Lansing Mizner.

Many hearts are touched in the death of Lansing Mizner. Mr. Mizner was a product of an earlier phase of the life of California—a true scion of that golden era whose twilight is passing. Perhaps none among us touched so intimately so many and such varied aspects of the life of San Francisco; and with it all he held an unshakable poise, to curiously fixed foundations of independent judgment. His mind accepted nothing at second-hand and nothing came from him that had not upon it the stamp of a vital individuality. There was in the man a quality of nature—a compound of penetration and sympathy, a blend of assurance and naiveté—that made him ever a charming companion and endeared him to all who knew him well. May he rest in peace!

One of the first musical instruments made by an American was a mouth harmonica, made by Benjamin Franklin at the time when he was minister at the court of Louis in France, where he played it with considerable skill before Marie Antoinette and her court ladies. The queen was so delighted and interested that Franklin presented the little instrument to her. After Marie Antoinette was beheaded in the great French revolution this mouth harmonica had many sensational experiences till finally it came into the possession of a wealthy musical amateur and collector in this country, who has it to this day.

THE CANADIAN EXCHANGES.

Striking illustration of the advantage the present exchange situation is to United States investors in Canada is furnished by the case of an Ohio farmer. He sells his farm in Ohio for $300 an acre, the equivalent, with exchange at 15 per cent, of $345 an acre in Canadian money. He moves to western Canada and buys a farm as big as his old one at $45 an acre. He still has $300 an acre in Canadian money for the farm he sold and has a new farm as big as his old one—and it cost him nothing. Query: Who paid for the farm?

There is still a disposition widely held among Canadians that in some way the United States is responsible for the discount on Canadian money. There is in consequence a widespread feeling of resentment, which, no matter how ill-founded it may be, must be taken into account by Americans doing business in the Dominion. This resentment was illustrated by D. D. McKenzie, a Liberal leader in the House of Commons, declaring the other day that he would refuse to do a nickel's worth of business with any country that refused to accept Canada's money at 100 cents on the dollar. McKenzie was looking south when he said this, and no doubt was speaking as a politician rather than as an economist.

This resentment is not held by hankers and well-informed business men, though those among them who desire to see smaller imports from the United States may do nothing to allay it.

One hanker writes to the press, pointing out how helpless the United States is in the matter, particularly as has been suggested in the way of arbitrarily putting the money of Canada on a par with gold. He points out that all the gold in the world aggregates $7,900,000,000, of which $3,200,000,000 is already held in the United States, leaving only $4,700,000,000 for all the rest of the world, or only little more than sufficient to settle the year 1919's adverse balance of trade in favor of the United States.

The one outstanding thing the United States can do to help rectify the Canadian dollar is to purchase more goods from Canada. Well-informed Canadians recognize, however, that to equalize exports with imports, while it will help greatly, will only afford a partial solution. One authority places the remedies in this order:

- (a) Deflation of currency.
- (b) Increased production and greater exports.
- (c) Increased immigration.

It is in the matter of helping to increase Canada's exports that the United States can help the exchange situation. And there are two potent reasons why this should be done: First, that the United States is undoubtedly losing business by the present situation; and second, if it is not done it will greatly

The Maine Election.

There is an old saying that as Maine goes so goes the Union. And while this dictum may not be logically sound, it still has an interest founded in tradition. A general election comes each year in Maine about two months prior to the national election—this year on the 13th instant, next Monday. Maine is essentially a Republican state and is expected this year, as usual, to elect a Republican ticket. Interest will centre upon the figures—upon the size of the Republican majority.

In 1916 Maine gave Hughes (Republican) 69,506 votes, Wilson (Democrat) 64,118 votes. In the state election of 1918—two years ago—Maine gave the Republican nominee for governor 64,069 votes, the Democratic candidate 58,918 votes.

Broadly speaking, the Republicans have in Maine a nominal majority of approximately 10,000. If on Monday next the Republican majority shall be 10,000 or over it will be accounted nationally as a striking Republican victory. If, on the other hand, the Republican majority shall fall much below 10,000, the hurrah will be the other way around, and it will give the Democrats nationally a large measure of comfort as indicating the attitude of the country at large.

It is because of the importance of the Maine election, psychologically considered, that both Republicans and Democrats have been putting in their besticks during the past twenty days. Officials representing both Republican and Democratic national organizations have been on the ground, and campaigners of approved vote-getting powers have literally been combing the state from Androscoggin to York. The usual professions of hopefulness are declared by both parties, but nobody will really know anything about it until next Monday evening.

The League Under Revision.

Proceedings of the conference at The Hague in which Mr. Elihu Root is engaged as a dominant figure are not reported. Yet from many circumstances—and a few leakages—we get the impression that the whole scheme of the league of nations is in the way of being rewritten. We get the further impression that the basic idea of the reconstructed league is a permanent court of international justice, as distinguished from a political combination of powers—in short, a species of super-court, as distinct from a super-government.

The project is not a new one. It is merely a swing-back to suggestions that preceded Mr. Wilson's insistence upon a political league. The Naval Appropriation bill, approved August 29, 1916, declared it to be "the policy of the United States to adjust and settle its international disputes through mediation and arbitration, to the end that war may be honorably avoided," and authorized and requested the President "to invite at an appropriate time, not later than the close of the war in Europe, all the great governments of the world to send representatives to a conference, which shall be charged with the duty of formulating a plan for a court of arbitration, or rather tribunal, to which the disputed questions between nations shall be referred for adjudication and peaceful settlement."

Here we have ready-sketches, long before a political league of nations was under discussion, a permanent court of international justice. Instead of following the suggestion of Congress, President Wilson, in conjunction with General Smuts, Lord Robert Cecil, and other British statesmen, entered into a project for a political league; and out of it all has come the famous Covenant, which has served, not to make peace, but rather to disturb and perplex the world, and in a very special sense to confuse our American politics. If the original plan, as above defined, had been made the basis of Mr. Wilson's European diplomacy, we should long before now have had in working operation and arrangement an organization commanding the respect of the world and that, in all likelihood, would have prevented the wars which are now desolating Central Europe.

When the Wilson Covenant was first reported to America it was criticized by Mr. Root as fundamentally defective in that it lacked the first essential, namely, a court of high moral authority to which contentions between nations might be referred for adjudication. It was this judgment, in connection with his established high international reputation, that led the leading nations to invite Mr. Root last April to come to Europe and enter into conference with representatives of European nations with the view to introducing into the scheme of the league, or to establishing in connection with it, an international court. Mr. Root made no public statement of purpose prior to his departure, nor has he since spoken, but the impression prevails that he had in mind the creation of a court not so definitely involved with the league as established by the Covenant as to fall with the league if it should be found in practice to be unworkable.

While it is not yet openly admitted that the political league is a failure, it is none the less apparent. Some twenty-eight or twenty-nine nations have formally entered into it and it may be defined as in a way a going concern. But its acceptance has been merely formal, and it has, at least up to the present time, made no real and effective impression in the sphere of world affairs.

The nations of the world are as contentious as ever. That the league has failed to maintain peace is attested by the eighteen wars, big and little, now raging in one region or another. Further, it is unofficially known that foremost men in the greater countries of Europe have lost whatever faith they may ever have had in the efficiency of the league as a promoter of peace. The Argonaut has positive sources of information to the effect that Lord Robert Cecil of England and Prime Minister Millerand of France—not to mention others—in private conversation refer to the league as a practical failure.

It may easily be believed that Mr. Root, who is dealing with the situation on the ground and whose personal prestige at this moment is probably higher than that of any other world statesman, has conceived the idea of putting into effect the plan that Mr. Wilson in his vanity and arrogance rejected. As matters stand, it would be easy, with the consent and coöperation of Europe, to so alter the scheme as to create an association of nations as an adjunct to an international court, instead of establishing a court as an adjunct to the league of nations. The league so altered should surely find favor with the American Congress, and there is no question that it would be satisfactory to the chancelleries of Europe, who have already intimated that readjustment satisfactory to the United States will be acceptable.

When upon the heels of the armistice it became necessary to send an American commission to Versailles all the proprieties called for the placing at its head of Mr. Root, our most distinguished international statesman. His appointment was expected by the country and would have been received alike by Democrats and Republicans as suitable. But Mr. Wilson, having determined to go himself, overlooked Mr. Root and named as associates a group of dummies of dependable subserviency. What followed needs not to be told. The world is in a mess of difficulties, and has been now for nearly two years, with no hopeful sign of immediate improvement. The league of nations is both a demonstrated and a confessed failure. The making of it postponed peace with the central powers for an unconscionable time. Even yet America and Germany are nominally at war. Although the league has been in operation now for a year it has not maintained peace, and it has no means of determining either in an authoritative or moral sense the rights and wrongs of European contentions. It is, we repeat, a demonstrated and confessed failure.

In the dilemma which they found themselves last spring the leading European nations, through the league, invited Mr. Root to conference, and now they are very obviously willing, and even eager, to make any readjustment that he, in conference with the leading statesmen, may define. The outcome is plainly indicated. It requires no prophet to see that the final determination will be, not upon Mr. Wilson's Covenant, but upon a plan that Mr. Root may define. In the end the adjustments of peace will be those, not of Mr. Wilson, but of the man whom Mr. Wilson in his vanity and jealousy overlooked.

Hoist by His Own Petard.

Governor Cox's charge that a fund of $15,000,000 is being raised by the Republican organization to "buy the presidency" for Senator Harding was clear and emphatic. Likewise clear and emphatic was his statement that he "had the facts" and was prepared to prove the charge. When it came to the point of proof he exhibited a paper bearing no evidence of authenticity purporting to be a schedule of "quotas" apportioned among the various states and cities of the country. The aggregate of these quotas was approximately $8,000,000, or a little above half the amount originally charged. Governor Cox made up the difference between $8,000,000 and $15,000,000 by the presumption that the actual returns would "about double the demand." It was by this extraordinary statement—by these amazing presumptions—that Governor Cox attempted to sustain his charge.

Now as to the facts, attested under oath before the Kenyon committee by Chairman Hays of the Republican national organization: The committee has not promulgated any schedule of quotas. In its efforts to get means to carry on the campaign it has named amounts that it would like to receive from several different centres, always, as Mr. Hays declares, "in excess of expectancy." The committee has got in something over a million dollars in money, and it has assurances that will run the total up to approximately $3,000,000. Local contributions to local campaigns it is expected will add another million. Thus the total already raised—and hoped for—is approximately $4,000,000, which political experts, including Chairman White of the Democratic National Committee, have declared to be "about right." This sum, in the opinion of both Republican and Democratic managers, is not more than enough to pay the legitimate costs of the campaign.

Governor Cox's charge falls to the ground of its own weight. Unless Chairman Hays lies—and nobody believes that he has lied—there has been no authoritative quota. And if there were, a quota is very far from being cash in hand. Further, if there were a quota, and if it were all that Governor Cox assumed it to be, then it could only yield a total of $8,000,000, as against Governor Cox's charge of $15,000,000. Governor Cox declared that he had facts and that he could support his statement by documentary evidence. Now, having completely failed to sustain his charge, he seeks to evade responsibility for it by shunting the whole business off upon the Kenyon committee. His latest outgiving is a frantic statement that "there is a quota" and that it is the duty of the Kenyon committee to prove it.

What must be thought of a man who first makes a gross charge, next reduces his accusation by one-half, next attempts to prove the remainder by a bogus document which in itself proves nothing? And what is to be thought of a man who definitely and passionately declares himself possessed of proofs, and who, upon being challenged to produce them, has to confess that he has no proofs? What is to be thought of a presumption so amazing in its mendacity and stupidity?

Very evidently Governor Cox's training in small politics has schooled him in cheap trickeries. Finding himself embarrassed by the real issues of the campaign, especially by his subserviency to Wilsonism, he sought to divert public attention to something else, and the handiest expedient was to create a scandal. Apparently he thought this might be done by mere assertion. Bitter indeed must be his chagrin to discover himself hoist by his own petard.

Governor Cox gets little comfort even from those friendly to his candidacy. For example, the New York Times, most devoted of his supporters (omitting reference, however, to Governor Cox's statement that he could prove his charge), says:

No one versed in such matters expected for a moment that he could "prove" the existence of a $15,000,000 Republican campaign fund. That was a round figure, convenient for use on the stump. But in the nature of the case there could be no proof, whether mathematical or logical, that such a sum had been or could be raised. "Quotas" are not collections. Campaign solicitors go out to their work very much in the spirit of General Grant, when a boy, selling a horse for his father. The asking price was much higher than what he was ready to take. We have also to be fair enough to take knowledge of the fact that the amounts gathered by the Republican National Committee are to be apportioned among state and local organizations. This puts a somewhat different color on the large total. Even accepting the figures produced by Governor Cox, the Republican campaign fund is still several millions short of what had been confidently charged.

Governor Cox in Close View.

While the attempt of Governor Cox to make scandal of the Republican campaign fund has failed of its purpose so far as the governor's own interest is concerned, it has served a good purpose. It has given to the country a close view of Governor Cox's mental habits and of his moral characteristics. It has cast a revealing light upon the character of a man who appeals for votes for the highest post in the government.

Everybody knew that he was the choice of that precious coterie of practical politicians, Boss Taggart of Indiana, Boss Thompson of Illinois, and Boss Murphy of Tammany Hall. Everybody knew that he was the choice of that faction of "wets" identified with the whisky interest, as against the milder "wets" favorable to lighter beverages. Everybody knew that he had been in a general sense an anti-Wilson Democrat and that his nomination was opposed by the agents and friends of the Administration.

Something of the man's intellectual and moral measure was betrayed in the surrender, following his nomination, to Mr. Wilson. When he abandoned his original faith and allegiance and made the Wilson policy his own it shook the faith of many who had hoped to find in him a man of independent character. Now, in this later incident, he reveals other weaknesses, completing a picture of a man lacking at many, if not at most, points the qualities which ought to be found in a President of the United States. A man capable of cooking up a slander in shape "convenient for platform use" upon mere presumption, a man who declares that he has proofs when he has none and when none are possible—a man who loses his temper and adds anger to mendacity when called upon to sustain his own assertions—surely such a man is not suited for the serious responsibilities that fall to a President of the United States.

In demonstrating the infirmities of his temper and character, in betraying the triviality of his political devices, Governor Cox has lost the respect of thoughtful men, of men of conscience, of men of responsibility. And in the opinion of the Argonaut he has signed and sealed his own political doom. Americans are capable, be it said in humiliation, of many forms of blundering. But we will not elect to the presidency a man obviously wanting in the fundamental quality of honesty.

Mr. Shortridge and the Senate.

Mr. Shortridge's victory in the primary of last week gives to the Republicans of California a senatorial candidate of dependable character. There is no question about Shortridge's Republicanism. The essential principles of the party have been the faith and doctrine of his life. Both in times prosperous and in times ill he has been a steadfast party man. In the Senate he may be depended upon to stand for Republican principles and to sustain the general policies of a Republican President.

And this is a matter of vital importance, for it is an open secret that even the small margin by which the party has controlled the Senate during the past two years is in danger of being lost. When the American people get into the mood of smashing things—and they now clearly intend to smash Wilsonism—they are apt to strike both right and left; and it would be no great surprise if the wave that is about to engulf the executive administration should engulf the Republican margin in the Senate. Only by diligence and loyalty can the integrity of the Republican party in the Senate be maintained.

California is one of the states where Republicans have the right to expect to gain a senator. The record of registration stands: Republicans, 779,854; Democrats, 288,449; Socialists, 19,071; Prohibitionists, 19,117; scattering, 2500; number declining to state party affiliation, 143,077. Unless there has been gross dishonesty in the declaration of party affiliation and sympathy, Republicans have a tremendous majority as against a combination of all other partisans and neutrals. With any approach to party loyalty, Mr. Shortridge should be elected hands down.

But there are both open and secret forces to be reckoned with. Mr. Phelan has the advantage which accrues to incumbency. He has large wealth, with wealthy—and liberal—relatives. He is a Native Son, still a force—though illogical and illegitimate—in politics, and he has such support as the Administration at Washington may give through the California "Federal Brigade." He is undoubtedly a hard man to beat, especially by one who must come, as Mr. Shortridge does, without other resources than those which lie in his character and his powers of reaching the public mind through personal appeal.

There are many reasons why Mr. Shortridge ought to be elected, but the main reason is his dependability as a Republican and in the probability that his vote will be needed to maintain in the Senate support of a Republican President. Furthermore, it is not right that a state whose political sentiment is overwhelmingly Republican should be represented by a Democrat.

California's legitimate interests, so far as they relate to politics, are bound up in the policies of the Republican party. We need protection for many of our productive industries, already handicapped by advanced rates of freight to Eastern markets. We need recognition and help from the government under policies to which the Democratic party is traditionally opposed and to which the Republican party is traditionally committed. Thus material interest combines with political calculation, and with the political sentiment of the state in behalf of Mr. Shortridge as against Mr. Phelan.

It is now less than two months to the day of election. It will be physically impossible for Mr. Shortridge to reach all, or even a tithe, of the voters of California in the way of personal appeal. He will do all that one man may possibly do to present the case to the public. But his surest dependence must be upon a common-sense appreciation of the conditions and upon assurance of his qualifications. Upon every score he is entitled to the votes of the Republicans of California. He is entitled to the votes of the Republicans of California in their own interests—in behalf of the maintenance of policies to which they are sentimentally attached, and with which their interests are practically allied.

Editorial Notes.

Dr. Belisario, president of the Republic of Panama, on arrival at New York last week, told a reporter that his country was free from the blight of H. C. L. General prices, he said, are not above normal, production is at high tide, business is good, the people are prosperous and happy. The republic has no debts and there is a surplus of $2,500,000 in the national treasury. A truly gratifying state of affairs! Yet we fear the condition is only temporary, at least at the point of the national surplus. President Belisario and family, a typical Central American group as to numbers, are booked at a New York hotel "for several weeks." When the president gets his bill the treasury surplus will be in the way of turning into a deficit.

Villa, according to reports from Mexico, has turned farmer, and under his "treaty" with the de facto government he has been given sixteen hundred mules, six hundred plows, two tractors, two threshing machines, two automobile trucks, and enough corrugated iron to build four spacious warehouses. These supplies have been shipped to Villa's ranch at Canutillo. Theoretically there is to be division of all this loot among Villa's followers, but we would like to bet something handsome that when the award shall be made there will be "barely enough for the officers."

It ill becomes the editor of the Fresno Republican to talk about "petty demagoguery." Yet we should bear in mind that the demagoguery which in its devotion to factional interest leads a man—and an editor—to abandon his known principles and support that which he has again and again condemned on moral grounds is not "petty." Nor is the demagoguery "petty" that leads a man—and an editor—to oppose a candidate for presidential nomination—a candidate who commands his "entire moral approval"—on grounds of personal consistency. There was, in the long ago, a time when the editor of the Fresno Republican looked to his conscience and judgment for guidance. Now he suffers under the moral deterioration which comes when a man is controlled, not by his conscience and judgment, but by his personal affiliations and his partisan commitments.

The success, by an emphatic vote, of Senator Moses in the New Hampshire primary is significant of New England sentiment in re the league of nations and Wilsonism in general. Senator Moses has been an outspoken opponent of the President and his policies, and it was with some aid from Washington that a bitter fight against him has been waged. The case has been one of very serious doubt and the result has unmistakable meaning.

Is it worth while, when money is needed for legitimate objects, to answer the appeal to save from sale the cottage in which Thomas Parr lived? His claim to fame is that he lived to be 152 and that he did penance for immorality at 100. Careful inquiry last century discredited the tradition as to the number of his years. His age was attested only by village gossip and by quacks, who sold what they falsely called "Parr's Life Pills." Brought to court in what was alleged to be his 153d year, Parr died in the course of a few months, killed by excessive diet.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Lest We Forget!

ROCKLIN, CAL., September 3, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: The killing of two missionaries in the Province of Shantung in China in 1897 afforded the German minister to Peking ample and convenient excuse to demand from China, among other things, "a place on the Chinese coast for the repair and equipment of German ships and for the storage of material and provisions for the same."

China tried to evade these monstrous demands by an offer of apology and compensation, but on November 10th Admiral von Diederich sailed in the Bay of Kiao Chau with his fleet and seized the bay and the territory at its mouth in the name of the German Emperor. China, unable to resist the diplomatic pressure of Von Diederich's guns, leased for a term of ninety-nine years a zone of one hundred Chinese miles of territory, with the right to erect fortifications therein and to construct lines of railroad in the Province of Shantung. This is the short and simple history of the now famous German concession of Shantung and the way in which kultur was first carried to the grateful inhabitants of Kiao Chau.

More was to flow from the incident than the original wrong to China, for it at once and directly led to the English concession of Weihaiwei, to the Boxer rebellion, and to the American policy of the "open door" to China. Henry Adams in his "Education" says of the latter: "The drama acted in Peking in the summer of 1900 * * * brought suddenly the inevitable struggle for the control of China. * * * John Hay alone championed China's administrative entity" * * * and "suddenly ignored European leadership, took the lead himself, and saved China."

With the manner in which the German concession in Shantung was acquired America had nothing to do; with the disposal of that concession, however, we had much to do, but with but little of either credit or honor in the doing.

When the world war broke out China promptly entered into negotiations with Germany for the return of Shantung. Japan met the move by presenting Germany with an ultimatum "to deliver on a date not later than September 15th to the imperial Japanese authorities * * * the entire leased territory of Kiao Chau." This ultimatum expired by limitation on August 23, 1914, and at the same time the negotiations between China and Germany ended with a bang. Japan then started in to reduce Kiao Chau. China offered troops to assist in the operation, which Japan refused. By November 7, 1914, Japan with some slight and fragmentary assistance from Great Britain overcame the German resistance at Kiao Chau.

In the meantime China tried to declare war on Germany, but Japan blocked the way. In 1915 China tried again, with the same effect resulting from the same cause. The Germans had been "had medicine" for China, but what the Japs might prove to be made Sherman's description of war seem a wholly inadequate comparison. China personally knew the consequences of Japan's benevolent course towards Korea, which began with the murder of its queen and ended with the total loss of political freedom in that wretched country. Knowing of this and of other equally disagreeable happenings in Manchuria and Mongolia, China demanded of Japan the return of the Port of Lungkow, which in flagrant violation of China's neutrality Japan had seized in the Kiao Chau operations and had neglected to return to China.

Japan's reply was characteristic. She presented to China her justly celebrated twenty-one demands. There were really twenty-two, the twenty-second being that if China so much as peeped about the other twenty-one, painful and sudden things would happen to her. As China felt that the worst had happened, she not only peeped, she literally yelled herself black in the face. Japan at once said that China was having a pipe dream and that she had made no demands. Then she reconsidered and acknowledged to eleven demands which she published. Then she added two more army corps to the two crack ones already in China's quivering midst and on May 7, 1915, presented China with an ultimatum and gave her fifty-one hours to act upon it.

China was helpless. Her only hope lay in aid extended from the outside, and on that particular date every one in Europe was exceedingly busy keeping in the war and every one in America equally busy keeping out of it, so China had to accede to Japan's demands. This is the treaty that our technical expert in Far Eastern affairs at the Paris conference described to President Wilson as "obtained by force and duress." This is certainly not an overdescription.

A rumor of this extraordinary diplomatic move having been wafted across the Pacific, on May 16, 1915, America sent notes to China and Japan "that it can not recognize any agreement or undertaking which has been entered into between the governments of China and Japan impairing the treaty rights of the United States and its citizens in China."

As an integral part of our foreign policy was then and still is John Hay's "open door" to China, in the light shed by these notes what follows becomes even more humiliating to America. In November, 1915, Viscount Ishii made flat objection to China's second attempt to enter the war both because of Japan's "paramount interest" in China and because "Japan could not view without uneasiness the moral awakening of 400,000,000 Chinese." This statement is commended to the careful study of all pro-Japanese and apologists for the rape of Shantung. These various moves and counter-moves bring us to the fateful year 1917.

On February 3, 1917, the President severed diplomatic relations with Germany. The next day, February 4th, he invited all the then neutral countries to pursue a similar course. China was inclined to accept the President's invitation, but again Japan interfered, warning China that the United States would probably get in the war too late and that the Entente allies as a consequence would lose. In which event it would be safer for China to act in harmony with Japan than to abandon her neutrality at America's suggestion. China naturally hesitated and approached the American minister at Peking. Our minister in reply to specific questions on China's part said that while he had no official instructions, as the cables were not working, he accepted responsibility, and gave as his judgment that assistance would be given China by the United States to recover Shantung at the peace conference. Relying on this assurance of the American minister, China severed diplomatic relations with Germany.

This assurance to China by the official representative of the government of the United States (who subsequently resigned) has never been repudiated by the government at Washington, unless President Wilson's reply to a question by Senator Hiram Johnson on August 19, 1919, can be construed as such. President Wilson then stated "we [the United States] made no promises" that we would protect her (China's) interests at the peace conference.

On February 16, 1917 (the significance of this date is paramount), Japan obtained from the British representative a note containing the following: "His Britannic majesty's government accedes with pleasure to the request of the Japanese government for an assurance that they will support Japan's claims in regard to the disposal of Germany's rights in Shantung." At the same time Japan obtained similar assurances from France, Italy, and Russia. These are the secret treaties that are said to have caused President Wilson to abandon China at the peace conference.

On August 14, 1917, China entered the war. As always curiously coincident, Japan's representative, Viscount Ishii, arrived in the United States on August 13th to negotiate what has since become known as the Lansing-Ishii agreement. On September 28th in a speech in New York Viscount Ishii proposed a Monroe Doctrine for the Far East. On November 2d the State Department at Washington gave out the Lansing-Ishii agreement, which contained, among other things, the following: "The governments of the United States and Japan recognize that territorial propinquity creates special interests between countries." On November 12th China sent the United States a note commenting on this agreement, which declared: "The Chinese government will not allow herself to be bound by any agreement entered into by other nations." China saw only too plainly the handwriting on the wall.

Japan, as soon as the Lansing-Ishii agreement was given out, promptly coalesced "territorial propinquity," "special interests," and Ishii's Far Eastern Monroe Doctrine into a working whole, and on the strength of it started a propaganda to the effect that the United States had consented that Japan should do as she pleased in China. When Japan added the misdescription "regional understanding" that the league of nations applies to the Monroe Doctrine the smoke screen became of such visibility as to, helatelly it is true, draw Mr. Lansing, who testified that: "Ishii said that he thought that Japan's special interest in China should be recognized in any agreement we might make. I said that of course the United States recognized that because of geographical location Japan had a peculiar interest in China, but that the danger of putting it in any agreement was that it might be misconstrued and that therefore I objected to it. I further told him that if he understood 'special interest' meant 'paramount interest' I could not discuss it further. Ishii suggested a Monroe Doctrine for the Far East. I told him that the Monroe Doctrine did not give the United States a paramount interest over any nation on this hemisphere and I thought the same principle should be given any other nation with regard to China. Ishii maintained silence."

China offered the Allies 100,000 trained men for use in Europe, but Japan blocked their acceptance. The Allies, however, did accept and make use of 250,000 Chinese coolies heading the lines in Belgium and France, to their and our added shame.

This brings the tale to the complete abandonment of China at the peace conference. An abandonment that was not only directly in contravention of international law, but also in the face of the promise implied but no less binding that China's interests at the peace table would be an associated power her protected by her co-belligerents. The only explanation ever given by the President, other than his denial to Senator Johnson that the United States had induced China by promises to enter the war, President Wilson made in a speech in St. Louis on September 5, 1919, at a Chamber of Commerce luncheon. "Great Britain and others, as everybody knows," said the President, "in order to make it more certain that Japan would come into the war and so assist to clear the Pacific of German fleets, had promised that any rights that Germany had in China should in case of victory of the Allies pass to Japan. There was no qualification in that promise. She was to get exactly what Germany had, * * * and so the only thing that was possible was to induce Japan to promise * * * that she would retain in Shantung none of the sovereign rights which Germany had enjoyed there, but would return the sovereignty without qualification to China and retain in Shantung Province only what other nationalities had elsewhere—economic rights." * * *

As soon as report of this speech reached Washington Senator Norris wired the President, calling his attention to the fact that whereas Japan entered the war on August 23, 1914, the secret agreements giving her Shantung were not made until March, 1917. The President telegraphed Senator Norris from Garrison, Montana, on September 12th thanking him for pointing out an "unintentional inaccuracy."

Notwithstanding this acknowledgment by the President on September 12th of an "unintentional inaccuracy," he repeated the statement made in the St. Louis speech of September 5th in speeches at Los Angeles on September 20th; at Reno, Nevada, on the 22d; at Salt Lake City, Utah, on the 23d, and at Cheyenne, Wyoming, on September 24th. As far as known, it is the only explanation that has ever been given, and it contains another "unintentional inaccuracy" besides the one pointed out by Senator Norris. China never gave and Germany never possessed and never exercised any sovereign rights in Shantung. Exactly how, therefore, Japan can return to China sovereign rights obtained by Japan from Germany that never were in Germany's possession is not exactly clear as crystal.

It is a sad tale, my masters, and a sadder ending, the reason for which seems to have been the threat of withdrawal by Japan at the psychological moment that was so inimical and threatening to the President's plans as to both upset his balance and to impair his sense of right and justice and to utterly destroy his perspective. But whatever the explanation, it must be a pathetic one both for America and China. China, feeling that she had been betrayed, would not, indeed could not, sign the treaty. The American Senate, for a not dissimilar reason, would not ratify the treaty, and the voters of the United States will in November record their opinion at the polls on this question.

Up to now it may be argued that whatever happened in Paris, Peking, Tokyo, or Washington the nominee of the Democratic party can not be held responsible for. The law, however, holds an accessory, even when after the fact, of almost equal guilt with the perpetrator of the crime. The Democratic platform expressly states and the Democratic nominee has explicitly and word by word endorsed the statement that "we advocate the immediate ratification of the treaty without reservations which would impair its essential integrity, but do not oppose acceptance of any reservation making clearer or more specific the obligation of the United States to the league associates."

JAMES G. BLAINE.

A stray paragraph on "Wars of the United States" enumerates nineteen wars. Ten of these were conflicts with Indian tribes, of which the most important were probably the Black Hawk war and the Seminole war. If these are called wars, an eleventh might be added—the Modoc war of 1873. The important wars on the list are the war of the revolution, the war of 1812, the Mexican war, the civil war, the Spanish war, the war with Germany. The minor conflicts included in the list are: the war with France, 1798; the war with Tripoli, 1803; the Philippine war, 1899.

HISTORY REPEATS ITSELF.

A very cursory acquaintance with the history of the world, which so few possess, would save us from one of those political vulgarities that have found a place in the currency of the day. I mean the popular assertion that we have now no interest in the affairs of Europe and that a true American policy implies isolation and detachment. That such folly should receive toleration in a commercial nation largely dependent upon the Old World for its trade is but another evidence of the power of the "slogan" to blight the intelligence and to obscure the facts.

It is due, of course, to our wretched methods of studying history and to the resulting conviction that the story of one nation can be disentangled from the story of the others. It can not be done. An event that seems to have been frozen into ancient history for five hundred years is suddenly found to have been alive all the time, and to have been stretching out its stealthy octopus tentacles to embrace nations then unborn. There can be no folly nor crime of statecraft committed anywhere or at any time that fails of its Nemesis, and its circles of inclusion grow wider as that Nemesis is postponed. Many centuries ago the Turks invaded Europe. They overran the Balkan States, and if the cries of their victims reached heaven, as they certainly seem to have done in view of recent events, it is equally certain that they did not reach the ears of their fellowmen. It was only when the Turks attacked Vienna that they were opposed and overthrown by the Poles under Sobieski, but they were infamously permitted to retain their hold upon the Balkans, while Poland was rewarded for her heroism by conquest and partition. It was in compensation for that crime that a hundred thousand Americans now lie dead in France. Every link in that terrible chain of cause and effect is now visible to the retrospective eye. We see now that only that happened that must have happened, that all of it was inevitable. There would have been no great war but for the presence of the Turks in Europe. There would have been no Crimean war, no Russo-Turkish war, no Balkan wars, no Russo-Japanese war. And America is now called upon to participate in the reconstruction of Poland, at least by her words, and to help to compensate for the crimes committed almost before she was born. Treitschke said once that human history is the record of the unfolding of the will of God in human affairs, and that to every event, however obscure, must be assigned a place in the fabric that is under construction. The true statesman is the man who can foresee the chain of cause and effect, but there seems to be none such now alive. We can not trace even the sequences that have past.

That history repeats itself is a truism. It repeats itself so faithfully as almost to suggest to the imaginative mind—and there can be no discovery of truth without imagination—that some superhuman intelligence confronts us with our unlearned lessons, forcing us to con the page once more, to repeat the old experience, to do it rightly. A thousand years ago Genseric, Attila, and Alaric—we may call them the Prussian, the Austrian, and the Bulgarian—made war upon Europe, and they were overthrown by the French at that first battle of the Marne, exactly on the field of the greater struggle of five years ago. But it was a mighty fight, that first one. The veracious chroniclers say that the light was obscured by the ghosts of the dead men struggling in the sky. Centuries later we have the invasion of Europe by the Turks and the resulting charter to the Mohammedans to occupy Europe. It was the tricklet on the mountainside that was to become the devastating torrent in the valley. Europe had the chance to remedy that wrong over and over again, and she would not. The ever enlarging cup of blood was pressed to her lips century after century, in wars and revolutions, and now comes the torrent of blood that has nearly destroyed her civilization. Poland had saved middle Europe from the Turk, but in the hour of her tribulation there was no one to save Poland. She was partitioned three times. Napoleon, it is true, gave her something like a reconstitution. When we get the mists out of our eyes we may see that here was a man called of God who shook down the tyrannies of the world like rotten fruit. But Europe was impenitent. Even before the smoke of her burning had passed away she had summoned the Vienna Congress to reenslave the slave, to reestablish the kings, to reenthron the tyrannies. She had remembered nothing, forgotten nothing, learned nothing. And now in the ever-widening cycles of time we must again face the Turkish question, awfully enlarged by the adhesion of the whole Mohammedan world. And here is Poland again asking us what we are going to do with her, just as she asked us centuries ago, but now with the incalculable powers of Germanism and Bolshevism on either side. Time took all these problems into her hidden places, brooded over them, vitalized them, magnified them, and now presents them to us once more. She asks us to the price that we have already paid. That price was not even the interest on the debt.

Poland is now where she was during the early partition period so far as the great principle of her independence is concerned. Her attitude toward the war was a matter of extraordinary importance. Russia, Germany, and Austria were all apprehensive of her action. All had guilty consciences. All had some portions of the swag concealed about their persons. The Grand Duke Nicholas of Russia issued a proclamation promising autonomy to the Russian Poles. Germany and Austria, less adroit and more brutal, tried to do by force what Russia tried to do by conciliation. Then came President Wilson with his Fourteen Points. He, too, promised liberty to the Poles, but he did not attempt any definition of Poland. Probably he did not know that the Polish frontiers were insusceptible of definition, that they had been moved so often and so far that they could no longer be identified. Such ignorance is by no means incredible. Lloyd George had never heard of Teschen. He did not know where Transylvania was or why the Roumanians wanted to possess it. Another great statesman, directing the foreign affairs of a great power, thought that Danzig was on the Mediterranean. That is the kind of intelligence that set itself the task of rebuilding the world. Now when Poland asked that the pledges made to her be redeemed she discovered at once that she was to be once more betrayed. Whatever importance she may have had during the war had quickly evaporated on the declaration of peace. She had not demanded the restoration of the whole of ancient Poland. That was obviously out of the question. Ancient Poland included the Ukraine, for example. But she did demand some substantial fulfillment of the pledges made to her. She asked that her autonomy be a real one and not a sham, and that her eastern frontier be so drawn as to be capable of defense. She demanded also that she be allowed access to the water through her own port of Danzig. It is to be remembered that here is no question of the restoration of an old frontier. There are many old frontiers, and some of them are so old as to be negligible. It was necessary to draw a new frontier, and Poland demanded that it be so drawn as to conform substantially with the pledges of the autonomy that had been made to her.

The conference broke those pledges. The violation was due partly to Lloyd George, who had some as yet undivulged reason for wanting to internationalize Danzig, and partly to President Wilson, who had had a revelation from on high regarding the self-determination of peoples. Thieves having broken into the house and murdered most of the inmates, the thieves now demanded a counting of heads in order to determine whether there were more thieves or inmates. As a result Poland found herself without a defensible eastern frontier, without the restoration of East Prussia, and without the possession of Danzig. Moving her new frontier eastward she came into collision with the Russians, who drove her back to the walls of Warsaw. Then there came the Polish rally and the Russian defeat. Incidentally we may observe that the League of Nations closed the port of Danzig to the munition ships that were bringing relief to the Poles and, so did what little it could to destroy a nation that was actually one of its members and to give aid to a people that was not one of its members. But all of this is relatively ancient history, and it is not necessary to do more than recapitulate its main features.

But what is to be done now? The wound is just as wide open and just as sore as ever it was. The Poles have been victorious, but can they sustain their victory without foreign aid? It may be that the Polish victory will hasten the downfall of the Bolshevik government, but on the other hand it may do nothing of the sort. It may do precisely the opposite. The revolutionary government of France during the Terror was greatly strengthened by defeats of the French armies on the frontier. These misfortunes rallied the people and caused them to demand military reform and the more energetic prosecution of the war. The Russian defeat may have the same result. Certainly we have heard nothing from Russia to justify optimism. Now are we to make a sort of ring around Russia and Poland as we would around a dog fight? Are we to say that this business is no affairs of ours and disinterestedly ill-will all the combatants from a platform of lofty superiority? Or are we to remember that we gave our pledge to Poland, that we became participants in the war because of that and other pledges, and that we were a member of the court of appeal to which Poland submitted her case and which gave a judgment based upon injustice? If we are now to witness unmoved the destruction of Poland, then we shall speedily find that our isolation is a chimera and that we have exposed ourselves to the contagion that must come from a Bolshevized Europe.

In the course of a few weeks we are likely to see great developments. At least we shall have some indication of what Russia intends to do. If she gives unmistakable evidence that she will not renew the war against the Poles, that she will accept the frontier that they demand, then we may believe that the sky has brightened and that a great crisis has been passed. We may even believe that Bolshevism is on the down grade and that the end is in sight. But if Russia does not accept her defeat, if she renews the war against the Poles, then it would be well for us to bestir ourselves and to ask what we intend to do about it. The Poles are a small people, but the Russians are a great one. We can not assume that the Poles can continue to hold their own. And if Poland goes down then we may reasonably believe that the whole of Europe will go with them. To say that America has no interest in such a matter, to pretend that the fate of Poland is nothing to her, is to display an incapacity for political thought, indeed for any kind of thought, that we may hope to be spared.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Annie S. Peck, the famous mountain climber, is now preparing for her second ascent of Mt. Huascarar, 21,812 feet high.

Candido Aguilar, minister of foreign affairs of Mexico, was a cane-cutter working for 37 cents a day fifteen years ago.

A Japanese woman is credited with being the richest woman in the world. She is Mrs. Yone Susuki, owner of steamboat lines, shipbuilding yards, and factories whose profits during the war, it is said, were 10,000,000 pounds sterling. Mrs. Susuki is on her way to Paris for a visit.

Mlle. Landry, daughter of the French minister of marine, has been given a position in the secretariat of the ministry. It has created a stir in Paris because it is unique for a woman to hold public office there. She has taken degrees in philosophy and law and is considered exceptionally capable.

Irene Richards, a former Gaiety Theatre girl, is now Marchioness of Queensberry, and as such not only entitled to move in the highest English society, but is the holder of one of the most famous titles in the British Empire. On her stationery she can have the "double tressure," and she can, if she choose, refer to Black Douglas as an ancestor of the family. Lord Sholto Douglas, her husband's uncle, also married an actress, although, the right of succession acting as a check, she never rose to the heights of a marchioness.

W. Averill Harriman, who used to spend his summer vacations in southern Oregon when his father, E. H. Harriman, had a summer home on Pelican Bay, Upper Klamath Lake, seems to be emulating the ways of his distinguished ancestor in financial affairs. He is head of the American Ship and Commerce Corporation, which has just announced a merger with the Hamburg-American Line, recorded as one of the largest deals in American shipping history. It is also announced that a working agreement has about been concluded with the North German Lloyd Steamship Line, the strongest competitor. The American Ship and Commerce Corporation is a holding company for several big combinations of maritime capital and its lines encircle the globe.

In the workmen's quarter, living in three small rooms, is an artist who, an eminent British critic believes, will create a furor when his work is put on exhibition in western Europe and America. C. W. Nevinson, the English painter, claims the credit of discovering him while on a visit to Prague. Whether the British critic and Nevinson are correct in their estimate, the story of the life of Jaroslav Hnerkovsky is as fascinating as any one could find in fiction. Born in a little country village near Prague thirty-five years ago, this Czech determined to become an engineer. He studied in the local school, and later obtained employment in the Austrian civil service as an engineer. Hnerkovsky reads Jack London's stories as a boy revels in the adventures of "Dashing Diamond Dick"—he paints as Jack London wrote.

The various child poets and novelists who have had recognition since the publication of "The Young Visitors" must take a retired position in the matter of tender years when they come to be compared to little Phyllis Joyce of Webster Avenue, New Rochelle, New York. This young poet and composer is only two months over three years old, according to her mother. Yet for more than a year she has not only been composing verse, but also setting her words to original tunes. Phyllis' mother does not know where she got the notion of word and musical composition and says frankly that neither of her parents has these talents, nor have the child's brothers and sisters exhibited such proclivities. The only music also that Phyllis has heard in the home is that furnished by a talking machine. "But Phyllis has been precocious in all ways," says Mrs. Joyce. "She walked at eight months, talked plain English at twelve months, and could count to twenty before she was a year old. She can not read, and all her compositions are dictated by her to me or one of the older children. The tunes the child composes she keeps in her head until some musical friend sets down the notes for her. All her little poems are childish and her melodies fit them. That is why we never think of her as a prodigy."

OLD FAVORITES.

Ivry.

Nor glory to the Lord of hosts, from whom all glories are!
And glory to our sovereign liege, King Henry of Navarre.
Now let there be the merry sound of music and of dance Through thy corn-fields green and sunny vines, O pleasant land of France!
And thou, Rochelle, our own Rochelle, proud city of the waters,
Again let rapture light the eyes of all thy mourning daughters;
As thou wert constant in our ills, be joyous in our joy;
For cold and stiff and still are they who wrought thy walls' annoy.
Hurrah! burrah! a single field batb turned the chance of war!
Hurrah! hurrah! for Ivry, and Henry of Navarre.

Oh! bow our hearts were beating, when, at the dawn of day,
We saw the army of the league drawn out in long array;
With all its priest-led citizens, and all its rebel peers,
And Appenzel's stout infantry, and Egmont's Flemish spears;
There rode the brood of false Lorraine, the curses of our land;
And dark Mayenne was in the midst, a truncheon in his hand;
And as we looked on them, we thought of Seine's empurpled flood,
And good Coligny's hoary hair all dabbled with his blood;
And we cried unto the living God, who rules the fate of war,
To fight for His own holy name, and Henry of Navarre.

The king is come to marshal us, all in his armor drest;
And he has bound a snow-white plume upon his gallant crest.
He looked upon his people, and a tear was in his eye;
He looked upon the traitors, and his glance was stern and high.
Right graciously he smiled on us, as rolled from wing to wing,
Down all our line, a deafening shout: God save our lord the king!
"And if my standard-bearer fall, as fall full well he may—
For never saw I promise yet of such a bloody fray—Press where ye see my white plume shine amidst the ranks of war,
And be your oriflammc today the helmet of Navarre."

Hurrah! the foes are moving. Hark to the mingled din,
Of life, and steed, and trump, and drum, and roaring culverin.
The fiery duke is pricking fast across Saint Andre's plain.
With all the hirling chivalry of Guelthers and Almayne.
Now by the lips of those ye love, fair gentlemen of France,
Charge for the golden lilies—upon them with the lance!

A thousand spears are striking deep, a thousand spears in rest,
A thousand knights are pressing close behind the snow-white crest;
And in they burst, and on they rushed while, like a guiding star,
Amidst the thickest carnage blazed the helmet of Navarre.

Now, God be praised, the days is ours: Mayenne hath turned his rein;
D'Aumale hath cried for quarter: the Flemish count is slain:
Their ranks are breaking like thin clouds before a Biscay gale;
The field is beaped with bleeding steeds, and flags, and cloven mail.
And then we thought on vengeance, and, all along our van,
Remember Saint Bartholomew! was passed from man to man.
But out spake gentle Henry—"No Frenchman is my foe:
Down, down, with every foreigner; but let your brethren go!"

Oh! was there ever such a knight, in friendship or in war,
As our sovereign lord, King Henry, the soldier of Navarre?

Right well fought all the Frenchmen who fought for France today;
And many a lordly banner God gave them for a prey.
But we of the religion have borne us best in fight;
And the good lord of Rosny hath ta'en the cornet white—
Our own true Maximilian the cornet white hatb ta'en,
The cornet white with crosses black, the flag of false Lorraine.
Up with it high: unfurl it wide—that all the host may know How God hath humbled the proud house which wrought His church such woe.
Then on the ground, while trumpets sound their loudest point of war,
Fling the red shreds, a footcloth meet for Henry of Navarre.

Ho! maidens of Vienna: ho! matrons of Lucerne—Weep, weep, and rend your hair for those who never shall return.
Ho! Philip, send, for charity, thy Mexican pistols, That Antwerp monks may sing a mass for thy poor spear-men's souls.
Ho! gallant nobles of the league, look that your arms be bright;
Ho! burghers of St. Genevieve, keep watch and ward tonight:
For our God hatb crushed the tyrant, our God hath raised the slave,
And mocked the counsel of the wise, and the valor of the brave.
Then glory to His holy name, from whom all glories are:
And glory to our sovereign lord, King Henry of Navarre!
—Lord Macaulay.

The first coin ever struck off by Rome had a figure of an ox on it, and the cow has been in most patriarchal epochs of society the symbol of fortune. "This family is mine and these are my cows," says the Arab sheik, a dweller in tents, and this has been the cause of the use of the root of languages which stands for cow being used in many terms that mean money. For instance, the Latin root pecus forms many such words.
Pecuniary reward first meant a payment in cows; pecuniarity originally referred to the number of cows a man had. The old Teutonic root for the word cow furnished the words "scot" and "scot-free"; a man who paid his bill or "scot" did so in a certain percentage of the value of a cow, and if he got into trouble but escaped without being mulcted in money he was said to have managed it without losing one of his cows.

THE LIFE OF DISRAELI.

Mr. George Earl Buckle Finishes the Great Biography Begun by the Late W. F. Monypenny.

The appearance of Volumes V and VI of "The Life of Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield," brings to its conclusion a monumental work that has seen many vicissitudes. On the death of W. F. Monypenny, the original biographer, the task was entrusted to George Earl Buckle, who explains in his preface that the last phase of Disraeli's life should have been completed in one volume, but that recent events in Russia had permitted a fuller presentation of Disraeli's Eastern policies. During more than half of the period covered by these two volumes—1868 to 1881—Disraeli was prime minister, and therefore the principal documents are his correspondence with Queen Victoria. This gives to the volumes a certain attractiveness lacking in their predecessors in the light that they throw upon the character and disposition of the sovereign. In many cases they show the queen as exhibiting a partisanship and an influence not usually associated with her functions. Lady Augusta Stanley told Clarendon that "Dizzy writes daily letters to the queen in his best novel style, telling her every scrap of political news dressed up to serve his own purpose, and every scrap of social gossip cooked to amuse her. She declares that she never had such letters in her life, which is probably true, and that she never before knew everything." In May of 1867 we find the following extracts from letters addressed by the queen to Disraeli:

May 14—The Queen was glad to hear how very warmly Mr. Disraeli was received yesterday. It is very significant. The Queen trusts that the debate tonight will be satisfactory, tho' Mr. Disraeli told her he had anticipated the worst.

WINDSOR CASTLE, May 16, 1868.—The Queen is most thankful to Mr. Disraeli for his kind and feeling letter. She feels most deeply when others do sympathize as he does with her; Mr. Disraeli has at all times shown the greatest consideration for her feelings.

The Queen sends by this evening's messenger a few more flowers for Mr. Disraeli.

BALMORAL, May 21—The Queen was very sorry to hear from Mr. Disraeli what an unsatisfactory night they had on Monday. She feels very anxious to hear what course they intend to pursue, but trusts that this as well as other difficulties will be got over, and this annoying Session soon be brought to an end.

May 23.—... Really there never was such conduct as that of the Opposition.

May 25.—The Queen thanks Mr. Disraeli for several kind letters.

The Queen is really shocked at the way in which the House of Commons go on; they really bring discredit on Constitutional Government. The Queen hopes and trusts, however, that today's division will be satisfactory and then there will be quiet.

Disraeli was not always the sycophant in his dealings with the queen. In the spring of 1868 she passed through Paris on her way to Switzerland, traveling incognito as the Countess of Kent. She received a visit from the empress, but declined to return it, and this brought on herself something like a reproof from the prime minister:

10, DOWNING STREET [August, 1868].—... There is no doubt that your Majesty acted quite rightly in declining to return the visit of the Empress at Paris. Such an act on your Majesty's part would have been quite inconsistent with the incognito assumed by your Majesty, for a return visit to a Sovereign is an act of high etiquette: which incognito is invented to guard against.

Nevertheless there is, Mr. Disraeli would ask permission to observe, perhaps no doubt that your Majesty was scarcely well advised in receiving the visit, as such a reception was equally inconsistent with incognito.

Disraeli lost his wife after thirty-three years of married life. The world had laughed at her queernesses and gaucheries, at her odd looks and sayings, at the clothes she wore and the stories she told. But there was compensation in her kindness and her absolute discretion, and there can be no doubt that her husband held her in the highest esteem. In May, 1872, he writes to Montagu Cory:

Miladi is suffering less. She went to Lady Waldegrave's last night, but was obliged to come home almost immediately. But, as she boastfully says, her illness was not found out. She delighted Fortescue by telling him that she had heard him very much praised. He pressed her very much when and where. She replied, "It was in bed."

Sir William gives a good account of her today, and seems to think he has remedied the pain, which is all we can hope for, and has sanctioned, and even advised, her to go to Court; but I don't think he allows enough for her extreme weakness. However, I shall be with her today; last night she was alone, which I think fearful.

H. of C. May 9, '72.—The visit to Court was not successful. She was suffering as she went, and was taken so unwell there that we had to retreat precipitately; but without much observation. Knowing the haunts of the palace a little, I got hold of some female attendants who were very serviceable.

CARLTON CLUB, May 14, '72.—I have been, and am, so harassed, that I have been quite unable to write a line—and this will be sad stuff.

Nothing encouraging at home. To see her every day weaker and weaker is heartrending. I have had, like all of us, some sorrows of this kind; but in every case, the fatal illness has been apparently sudden, and comparatively short. The shock is great under such circumstances no doubt, but there is a rebound in the nature of things. But to witness this gradual death of one, who has shared so long, and so completely, my life, entirely unmans me.

Among Lady Beaconsfield's papers was found a touching letter of farewell to her husband, written many years before, in view of the high probability that she, who was the elder by twelve years, would be the first to die:

June 6, 1856.

MY OWN DEAR HUSBAND.—If I should depart this life before you, leave orders that we may be buried in the same grave at whatever distance you may die from England. And now, God bless you, my kindest, dearest! You have been a perfect husband to me. Be put by my side in the same grave. And now, farewell, my dear Dizzy. Do not live alone, dearest. Some one I earnestly hope you may find as attached to you as your own devoted MARY ANNE.

It is a curious fact that Disraeli wished to marry a second time at the age of sixty-eight. In 1874 he wrote, "I feel fortunate in serving a female sovereign. I owe everything to woman; and if, in the sunset of life, I have still a young heart, it is due to that influence." For a time his choice hovered between the two sisters, Lady Chesterfield and Lady Bradford:

So necessary to Disraeli's life was the intimacy thus established—"the delightful society," as he told Lady Chesterfield in March, 1874, "of the two persons I love most in the world"—that he endeavored to make it permanent by asking Lady Chesterfield to marry him, so that he might grapple one lady to his heart as his wife, and the other as his sister. She not unnaturally refused. Even had she been willing, when she had passed her seventieth birthday, to marry once more, she must have speedily realized that she did not occupy the first place in Disraeli's affections. For though it was to Lady Chesterfield, as the only sister who was free, that he proposed marriage, it was to Lady Bradford that he was most tenderly attached. He wrote to her more than twice as many letters as he did to her sister, sometimes, when in office, sending her two, or even three, in one day, by special messengers from Downing Street or from the Treasury bench. Such messengers, he wrote, "may wait at your house the whole day, and are the slaves of your will. A messenger from a Prime Minister to a Mistress of the Horse can not say his soul is his own." Romantic devotion breathes in Disraeli's language to both sisters; but the Oriental extravagance of his sentiments is beyond a doubt more marked when he is addressing Lady Bradford. The correspondence with Lady Chesterfield, in spite of the offer and refusal, preserves on the whole an even tone of deeply affectionate friendship. But Lady Bradford was often taken aback by Disraeli's septuagenarian ardour, and embarrassed by his incessant calls at her house in Belgrave Square and his unending demands on her time; though she, as well as her sister, could not but be flattered by the assiduous attentions of one who was for the greater part of the last eight years of his life the most famous and admired man in the country.

Disraeli again became prime minister in 1874, under peculiarly auspicious circumstances. He was surrounded by capable and loyal colleagues, and regarded with peculiar favor by the queen:

It was a triumph of romance, but it was also a tragedy. The hero had all that he had played for; but fruition had been delayed till he was in his seventieth year and had lost the partner of his life and of his ambition. Even on his first attainment of the Premiership in 1868, he had said to W. F. Haydon in reply to congratulations, "For me it is twenty years too late. Give me your age and your health." How much more fervently did he echo that cry of "Too late" to those who congratulated him six years afterwards! "Power!" he was heard once to mutter in his triumphal year of 1878; "it has come to me too late. There were days when, on waking, I felt I could move dynasties and governments; but that has passed away." That youth was the period for action; that to be granted adequate scope for your genius when young was the supreme gift of Heaven, had always been his creed. Now, however much he might call in art to assist nature, he was indubitably becoming old; though he might still be fresh in spirit, he was not physically comparable to Palmerston when he reached the Premiership at a similar age in 1855, or to Gladstone when he took up the burden a second time at the age of seventy in 1880. Tough as Disraeli's fibre had proved through the struggles of nearly fifty years, he had never been really robust, and indeed in early manhood he had undergone a prolonged period of grave debility. His intimate notes to his wife from the House of Commons form a constant record of indisposition, and of requests for pills and other remedies or prophylactics. Then in 1867 he had had a serious attack of gout, and he had suffered intermittently since, notably from bronchial trouble in 1870.

In 1874 we find Disraeli strongly opposing the Home Rule bill. He writes to Lady Bradford after his speech that he is "not displeased with himself," but he is much annoyed because the Times turns "morbid sentiment" into a "mere bit of sentiment," which he says is "a feeble vulgarism":

Disraeli's speech on the Home Rule debate was one of his very happiest performances. Its keynote was a bantering protest against the absurd insistence of the Irish in proclaiming to the world that they were a subjugated people, a conquered race. The House seized the point with immediate sympathy and punctuated the sentences in which he elaborated it with frequent cheers. "I have always been surprised," he said, "that a people gifted with so much genius, so much sentiment, such winning qualities, should he—I am sure they will pardon my saying it; my remark is an abstract and not a personal one—so deficient in self-respect." He denied that the Irish were conquered; "they are proud of it; I deny that they have any ground for that pride." England had been subjugated quite as much, but never boasted of it. Both the Normans and Cromwell had conquered England, before they conquered Ireland. He was opposed to Home Rule in the interests of the Irish themselves. "I am opposed to it because I wish to see at this important crisis of the world—that perhaps is nearer arriving than some of us suppose—a united people welded in one great nationality; and because I feel that, if we sanction this policy, if we do not cleanse the Parliamentary homom of this perilous stuff, we shall bring about the disintegration of the Kingdom and the destruction of the Empire."

The queen was very angry at the publication of the Greville Memoirs with its exposure of the vices and foibles of her royal uncles. She writes strongly to Disraeli on the subject:

BALMORAL, Nov. 12, '74.—The Queen thanks Mr. Disraeli for his letters received today. She hopes that he is quite well and taking care of himself. But she would strongly advise him not to accustom himself to very hot rooms, for nothing gives people more cold than sitting over a large fire and then going out.

The Queen omitted in her last letter saying how horrified and indignant she is at this dreadful and really scandalous book of Mr. C. Greville's, who seems to have put down all the gossip which he collected and which, as we well know from the experience of the present day, is totally unreliable. His indiscretion, indelicacy, ingratitude towards friends, betrayal of confidence and shameful disloyalty towards his Sovereign make it very important that the book should be severely censured and discredited. The tone in which he speaks of royalty, is unlike anything which one sees in history even, of people hundreds of years ago, and is most reprehensible.

Mr. Reeve however is almost as much to blame considering that he is a servant of the Crown and ought never to have consented to publish such an abominable book.

The proposed visit to India of the Prince of Wales gave rise to considerable difficulties, although it was considered wise that the journey should be undertaken for its political effect, as well as for the education of the prince:

While the question of the external security of India on its northwest frontier hung fire, Disraeli was deeply engaged in promoting its internal consolidation and contentment by arranging for a personal visit of the heir to the Throne. The original idea appears not to have been his, but to have come from the Prince of Wales himself, who had already visited the principal Colonies and rightly thought it his duty now to proceed to India. The Queen gave her assent; but, on reconsideration of the many personal and political difficulties involved, would gladly have recalled it. Her Prime Minister and Indian Secretary, however, recognized the immense political importance of establishing those personal relations between the British Throne and the princes and peoples of India, on which Disraeli had insisted at the time of the Mutiny. Disraeli, at the Queen's request, undertook the management of the affair, with Salisbury's assistance; and a thorny and anxious business he found it. There was the critical question of expense. "A Prince of Wales must not move in India in a mesquin manner. Everything must be done on an Imperial scale," as the Queen and her Minister agreed. "The simplicity of arrangements which might suit a visit to our own fellow-subjects in the Colonies," Disraeli said in the House of Commons, would not equally apply in the case of India. There was that remarkable and deeply rooted characteristic of Oriental manners—the exchange of presents between visitors and their hosts. Presents of ceremonial could rightly be discouraged; but the Prince would visit immense populations and be the guest, or make the acquaintance, of many chiefs and rulers, and he "must be placed in a position to exercise those spontaneous feelings, characteristic of his nature, of generosity and splendour, which his own character, and the character of the country likewise, requires to be gratified." Disraeli accordingly proposed a vote, in addition to the charge for the cost of the journey, of £60,000 for the Prince's personal expenses during the visit.

Disraeli was very anxious that the queen should assume the title of Empress of India, but whether his main object was to appeal to the sentiment of India or to please the queen must remain a matter of some conjecture. Of course there were difficulties with Parliament and also, curiously enough, with the Prince of Wales, who complained that he had not been informed of the proposed measure:

Over the Royal Titles Bill Ministers were much more successful than over the Slave Circular, though they were met at every stage by the devices of faction. A curious omission on Disraeli's part contributed to inflame his opponents. In matters affecting the dignity of the Crown, it had been the practice for the responsible Minister, in order to minimize controversy, to enter into communication with the leaders of Opposition. But Disraeli, in spite of the easy social relations which he enjoyed with both the official Liberal leaders, Granville and Hartington, neglected this customary and courteous precaution until the measure was already laboring heavily amid storms of parliamentary criticism. The Queen took the blame on herself. She wrote to Disraeli on February 10: "She is provoked at the conduct of the Opposition about the Indian title, but thinks perhaps she ought (as was done in the case of the Prince's title of Prince Consort) to have herself informed Lord Granville of it, and thus have prevented the disagreeable remarks. She could still do this, and state how much she had urged this herself, if Mr. Disraeli is of the same opinion." Her Majesty also accepted the responsibility for a further omission, which led the Prince of Wales to write to Disraeli from Seville on April 22: "As the Queen's eldest son I think I have some right to feel annoyed that . . . the announcement of the addition to the Queen's title should have been read by me in the newspapers, instead of having received some intimation on the subject from the Prime Minister." Ponsonby wrote on the Queen's behalf to Disraeli on May 3: "She blames herself for not having written to [the Prince] about the Titles Bill, adding, however, that she certainly thought she had done so."

Disraeli did not at once take Parliament into his confidence as to the nature of the new title, but he made frequent use in his speech of the words "empire" and "imperial":

It was not until the debate on the second reading that Disraeli revealed what the new title was to be; and, in an adroit speech, he skillfully led up to the announcement by pointing out the remarkable circumstance that, to those desirous of objecting to the policy, one title alone has occurred: "which prima facie is rather in favor of its being an apposite title." It was not difficult to dispose of objections which can hardly be read with patience now. As for the "bad associations" of the title of Emperor, Gibbon had laid it down in an immortal passage that the happiness of mankind was never so completely assured or so long maintained as in the age of the Antonines—who were Emperors. Nor could the assumption of the title locally at all impair the title of King or Queen of Great Britain. Our Kings had always asserted an equity with Emperors, and the claim had been allowed. Nor was the title un-English; it was used of Queen Elizabeth in Spenser's dedication to her of the "Faery Queen." The style of Empress of India so completely corresponded with notorious fact that, as Disraeli showed, to the amusement of the House, in a subsequent speech, it had been already attributed to Queen Victoria in a popular school geography of the day.

Lady Ely, writing to Disraeli, said that the queen was much annoyed by the parliamentary opposition. "She fears you have been much annoyed, but her displeasure is very great with those who have opposed it."

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending September 4, 1920, were $149,000,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $131,000,000; a gain of $18,000,000 for the year.

The total gold reserves of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco for the week ending September 3, 1920, increased $45,000, and total reserves showed an increase of $400.

The amount of gold reserve of the United States available against notes in actual circulation on July 1, 1920, was more than three times that of any of the nations of western Europe, according to information published by the National Bank of Commerce in New York in the September number of its magazine, Commerce Monthly. This country had $2,234,000,000 in gold as against $4,512,000,000 in notes, giving it a reserve of 49.5 per cent. of Consequently the holdover from the preceding year has in good measure been cared for and the new crop-moving season has begun on schedule and under more favorable conditions than seemed possible a month ago. It is reported from some sections of the Middle West that bank loans to finance the actual harvesting of the new crops are being reduced at an earlier date than is usually the case. While the credit requirements of the new movement will not reach maximum volume for some time to come, and while easier credit can not be expected until the peak of the movement has passed, the situation has improved sufficiently to make reasonably clear that the autumn agricultural demands for credit will not be in excess of the ability of the banks to supply.

There are indications also that many commercial borrowers, in response to expectations of a credit stringency during the fall which have prevailed for many months, have at least to some extent anticipated their autumn requirements for credit. This factor, coupled with the continued tendency toward reduced volume of business and lower prices for many commodities, may be expected to relieve the pressure of commercial and industrial credit requirements. It must be recognized, however, that some little time will be necessary for this relief to make itself manifest, because of the interval which must elapse before a new policy in business brings results.

E. H. Rollins & Sons and the Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are participating in an offer of $100,000,000 Government of the French Republic twenty-five-year external gold loan 8 per cent. sinking fund bonds in denominations of $1000, $500, and $100, registerable as to principal and interchangeable as to denomination. These bonds are free from French taxes, payable at 110 per cent. of the principal sum on or before September 15, 1945.

Beginning December 15, 1920, the French government must pay to J. P. Morgan & Co. as sinking fund trustee not less than $4,400,000 annually. Such payments during the first five years are to be applied to the purchase of bonds in the open market at, up to, and including 110 and interest. Subsequent payments are to be applied to the call of the bonds by lot at 110 and interest. If no bonds can be bought at 110 and interest or less on the market during the first five-year period, the sinking fund will be cumulative during the first five years.

The sinking fund payments will be sufficient to redeem the entire issue at or before maturity at 110 and interest.

There has been a marking up of the price of pig-iron recently, reflecting merely a temporary scarcity, but from the present outlook there can be no permanency in such movements. In fact, the only definite undercurrent in steel and iron and in most products is downward, despite the very large underlying demand that there is in the trade. The only salvation in our general business world is to produce more efficiently, and there is enough steel and iron-making capacity in the country to suggest a production large enough to meet all demands for an indefinite period.

In the copper trade producers seem to be holding things rather steady in anticipation of long-delayed buying orders from the more important consuming interests. There has been a decided change for the better in the market for silver metal, though until matters in the Orient are definitely improved it is not likely that we will see a recurrence of the high silver market of last year.

There has been a wholesale unloading of sugar, coffee, rubber, hides, and other commodities that had been held for speculative purposes by so-called profiteers. The demand of the banks that loans must be liquidated has caused serious losses to many speculators in different commodities. This has happened in chemicals, nuts, spices, and practically the general run of imports. Losses have run all the way from 25 to more than 50 per cent. in different lines, and our world of commerce reflects appalling and wide-reaching pecuniary losses. There are some lines, such as coal and paper, that have been holding up against the tide, and it is a question when they, too, must fall despite the apparent scarcity of supply.

A doctor in the West writes of his investment experience as follows: "Have had the usual luck in helping to put local enterprises on their feet (at my expense). Have unloaded my gold mine stock and am now only keeping up taxes on unimproved real estate—which ought to sell, but doesn't. I bought my share of Liberty bonds for patriotism, and some recently for investment. . . . I now want some information in regard to long-term investments."

He is one of our new investors, on whom the financing of American business and foreign loans now largely depends (says World's Work). Many of our old investors—our four hundred thousand who were formerly our only bond buyers—are now paying a good share of their income to the government in taxes, and the rest they are putting into securities that are exempt from the income tax, such as municipal bonds. They are not buying many corporation and foreign government bonds.

But every new security offering that is brought out by the large investment houses is bringing in applications for the bonds from people that they never knew before. They are very careful in the investment banking houses these days to treat courteously every one that comes in. The stranger entering might be a new millionaire, created by the war, or he might, like this doctor, be a new investor in securities, who received his first lesson from the Liberty loans. It is the growing total of these latter that is temporarily taking the place of our richest bond buyers of the past. And many of those who buy bonds at present low prices will become our rich investors of the future.

This California doctor has had the usual experience of many Americans, although he seems to have been more fortunate than most, for he says he has unloaded his gold mine stock. He has, however, lost his share in local enterprises. Sometimes these losses can not be avoided; local business and professional men sometimes have to support such propositions for purely business reasons. But there is always the objection to such enterprises, from the investment standpoint, that they are new and untried and are only entitled to consideration as purely business ventures and therefore are highly speculative. And they do not have on them the check of an experienced investment house, which is one of the best safeguards for the investor, provided the house has a high reputation which it wishes to uphold.

And local investments outside of business ventures sometimes have their drawbacks. A widow who had all her funds invested in local mortgages in a Connecticut mill town, where she lived, was worse off than many of the mill workers themselves when a business depression hit the town and closed all the mills. If she had foreclosed on the mortgages, she most certainly would have had to move from the town where she had lived all her life, because of the enemies such action would create. The only thing she could do was to scrimp along on little or no income until the depression passed and the mills reopened. Here again she would have been better off if she had bought real estate mortgage through a house of experience in that field which would have stood between her and the borrowers of the money.

Some elaborate get-rich-quick promotion propositions are put over by appealing to local pride. That was the basis of the Pan Motor promotion of that would-be Napoleon of finance, S. C. Pandolfo, although his stock-selling operations were not confined to St. Cloud, Minnesota, but were nation-wide. He used the people of St. Cloud to further his wider operations. More recently, in Des Moines, under the name of the Associated Packing Company, another gigantic get-rich-quick promotion scheme was floated by appealing to local pride, and about three million dollars were taken from the people of Iowa.

It has been the Liberty Loan bonds that have carried the investment vision of this California doctor, of many others who are now writing to this and other magazines and newspapers in regard to investments, of those who are coming or writing to the investment houses in response to their offerings—it has been these bonds that have carried their vision beyond these local "investments," which frequently prove unsatisfactory, into the broader field of what might be called national investments. The Liberty bonds are the best securities in this field, but the purchasers of them have now discovered that there are other good securities in the field, and they are now beginning to find out that these securities are meant for them as well as for the men who have more money than they have. There is a broadening of the investment market going on that is to the advantage of the nation and to these new individual investors as well.

Let us draw a picture from the mind of what this growth in the number of investors in "national" securities will mean. It is the huddling up of new sprinkles of capital throughout the country which will feed the creeks that in turn will be led by the conservative investment banker into the great rivers of investment capital that furnish the power to our railroads, our public utilities, and to the industries of the country, and some of which flows across the ocean to aid in the reconstruction of our fellow-nations. It is the water of such springs that fertilizes the valleys of progress; without it business must wither and prosperity dry up.

Let us also see what it means to the individual.

Government statistics indicate that 98 per cent. of the American people are living from day to day on their wages, and that a loss of employment would mean pauperism for all but 2 per cent. of us. At the age of sixty-five years, ninety-seven out of every hundred people in America are partly or wholly dependent upon relatives, friends, or the public for their daily bread, their clothing, and for a roof over their heads. But it is not because these people do not have money during the earlier years of their life. The income-tax returns show that 87 per cent. of the people received 64 per cent. of the income. After 18 per cent. has gone to 1½ per cent. of the people, largely because they or their fathers have not spent all they received in years past, but have set some of it to work for them in investments, the remaining 82 per cent. of the total income is pretty well divided among the rest. But these are the 98 per cent. who have lived up to the limit of their income or have lost it in foolish speculation. When their income ceases, they become dependent upon others. What a need there is for the spreading of the principles of thrift and sound investing in the field! How encouraging it is to know that the Liberty Loans have started the education of these people along these lines.

How the dollar invested works for the individual himself has been best illustrated by that first great American teacher of thrift, Benjamin Franklin. In 1791 he bequeathed £1000 to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and to the City of Boston, as a mark of his appreciation for having appointed him as agent in England at the "handsome" salary of £2000. And in order to make his bequest really valuable, with his great foresight, Franklin provided in his will that this £1000 should be put out at 5 per cent. interest for 100 years; that at the end of that time 31/131 of the fund accumulated should again be put out at interest for another hundred years and then the fund should be divided, one-fourth to Boston and three-fourths to the state.

Let us see how well that £1000 of Franklin's has worked. At the end of the first hundred years it had grown to $431,383.62. It was then divided in accordance with the will; $329,300.48 was set aside for "Public Work" and $102,083.15 was started on its course of earning interest for another hundred years. That was in 1891. On January 1, 1918, this sum had grown to $267,805.15 and Lee, Higginson & Co., who have recalled this remarkable bequest to public attention in "A Little Book of Great Import," point out that at this rate of increase the fund should amount to at least six million dollars when the second period is completed, and may be considerably more.

This example exaggerates what invested money may do for an individual during an average lifetime, but it is a graphic demonstration of the results that may be obtained by applying the principles of Franklin, and it shows the wisdom of belonging to the investing class.

the paper circulation, a ratio which also far exceeded that of any European country.

The nation most nearly approaching this country's percentage of reserve was Great Britain, whose gold holdings amounted to 31.5 per cent. of her note circulation, while France on the same date had only 9.6 per cent. Germany and Austria had reserves of only 1.6 per cent. and 0.4 per cent. respectively. Italy, on September 30, 1919, the latest date for which data are available, possessed a gold reserve of only 7.8 per cent. of her paper currency, says the bank's magazine.

Wide differences are shown by the bank also to exist between the total amount of notes outstanding in the various countries.

The $4,512,000,000 of paper money in the United States compares with $16,104,000,000 in Germany and $12,559,000,000 in Austria-Hungary. Great Britain's note circulation on June 30, 1920, was only $2,258,000,000 and the French total of notes outstanding at about the same date was equal to $7,288,000,000. Italy on September 30, 1919, had $3,157,000,000 of paper outstanding. In giving these amounts the bank has converted the units of foreign currencies into dollars at their respective par of exchange.

The gradual improvement of transportation which has been effected during recent weeks has permitted a somewhat more rapid movement of grain than had been anticipated.

after the charges for operation, taxes, interest, and depreciation, were $160,475.59 more than the net showing for the same month last year. These facts are contained in a statement just given to Cyrus Peirce & Co. by the corporation.

The remarkable improvement is due to a combination of favorable factors, according to the vice-president of the power company. The gross earnings increased $86,363.62. Of this amount about $51,000 is the result of recently connected load, and the balance is the result of rate increase granted this year.

On July 15th the company placed in operation the 12,500 K.W. addition to its Bakersfield plant, and on August 15th the new 40,000 K.W. Kerckhoff hydro plant on the San Joaquin River began operating. With this additional power for sale, the earning situation should show a constant improvement during the balance of the year.

This year natural gas instead of oil was used under the boilers at the Bakersfield plant, and although the output of the steam plant for the last fifteen days was approximately 40 per cent. more than the whole month of the preceding year, the fuel cost decreased $7317.67.

Last year in July the purchase of power from other companies amounted to $83,046.69; this July the purchased power amounted to but $4961.93. This reduction was possible by reason of the increased output of the Bakersfield steam plant, and because the approaching completion of the company's new Kerckhoff hydro plant permitted the use of Crane Valley Reservoir storage water through the San Joaquin River North Fork power houses.

A return to the pre-war service of the Sunset Limited, the Southern Pacific's crack train operating between San Francisco and New Orleans, is announced by the management for October 1st.

The new schedule will cut the running time between the two cities by eleven hours on the eastbound trip and by two hours coming west. The train will have an all-Pullman complement.

The Sunset Limited, since its inauguration many years ago, has always been popular with the traveler, for it is not alone the line of lowest altitude between the Crescent City and the Golden Gate, but it has the distinction of connecting two cities famous the world over for cuisine excellence.

There are no signs of a general slackening in external or internal Canadian trade, although political developments in Europe do not preclude an early resumption of normal trading between Canada and that continent (says the Canadian Bank of Commerce in its August monthly commercial letter). A further decline in the price of wheat, wool, and a few other commodities has naturally made buyers more cautious, but in the domestic situation there is no lack of confidence. Manufacturers in many centres report improved efficiency on the part of labor, indicating a trend in the direction of more normal conditions. By relinquishing its control of the wheat market, the Dominion government has shown its belief that the usual method will be found adequate for the handling of this season's crop of cereals, which promises to be above the average. Between now and the end of the year the carrying of the crop will impose an unusual strain on land and water transport; and to this will be added an increase in general traffic roughly proportionate to the volume of grain marketed. Although there will be difficulties to be overcome in this connection, the business public maintains a confident attitude, for which added justification may be found in the satisfactory way in which obligations of all kinds are being met, and in the comparatively low percentage of business failures.

The Fireman's Fund Insurance Company announced the allowance of an extra month's salary to all employees in the service of the company since July 1, 1919, and a pro rata bonus to those who joined the company subsequent to that date. This is the fourth bonus allowed the employees of the Fireman's Fund throughout the country since December, 1918.

Mr. John S. Staats of Pasadena has arrived

For the past eleven years he has been with the Pasadena office. Mr. J. W. Edmiston, a director and vice-president of the company, will continue in charge of the local office.

The American prune evidently gained the permanent friendship of the Europeans during its war experiences. The quantity exported from the United States in the first fiscal year after the war, the year ending June 30, 1920, was double the average of the war period and the value in 1920 two and one-half times as much as in 1919 and five times as much as in 1918.

Most of this big increase in the exportation of prunes, says a statement by the National City Bank of New York, occurs in the movement to Europe, from which we adopted the prune a half-century ago and have acclimated it and developed its production until the United States now produces not only more than Europe, but, in fact, more than all the world outside of our own country. France, Italy, and the Danubian area were the world's chief producers of prunes until the adaptability of the Pacific Coast soil and climate to its production and curing became apparent, and the production of prunes in California, Oregon, and Washington reached 100,000,000 pounds in 1900, 210,000,000 in 1912, and approximately 350,000,000 in 1919, valued at $40,000,000 at the place of production.

This growth in the exportation of prunes, says the bank's statement, illustrates the development of new industries in the United States. Raisins exported in 1920 showed a total value of nearly $13,000,000 against $8,000,000 one year earlier and $5,000,000 two years earlier. Oranges exported in 1920 amounted to $7,500,000 against $4,500,000 in 1918; lemons, $1,250,000 against $500,000 two years earlier, and the total value of all fruits and nuts exported in the fiscal year 1920 was $118,000,000 against $71,000,000 in 1919 and $34,000,000 in 1918.

The bond market has experienced a real measure of improvement recently. The absorption by investors of corporate and particularly of railroad securities has been good and has extended to bonds of the second and third grade. The general trend of prices, moreover, has been moderately upward (according to information published by the National Bank of Commerce in New York in the September number of its magazine, Commerce Monthly).

This improvement in tone is a reflection of the more definite and improved position of the railroads which will result from the settlement of the railroad wage question and allowance of substantially increased freight and passenger rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It reflects, also, a feeling that the readjustment of business and prices to a more normal level is proceeding satisfactorily and that this process will ultimately release to the investment market a more adequate supply of credit. While these factors have occasioned a moderate upward trend of bond prices, the tremendous volume of new financing which awaits a favorable market constitutes a retarding element which may occasion repeated fluctuations in the trend. It must be expected that at each new level of prices, outstanding bond issues will meet with competition of new flotations.

Politics in general are likely to play a rather important part in the stock market considerations for the next few months. The larger politics in Europe, as reflected in wars and uprisings, naturally have a tendency to disturb sentiment and the world may have to wait considerably longer than it had been hoping before peaceful intercourse among all nations will have been resumed.

The suffragist victory in Tennessee will bring a new influence into the balloting in November, which is already reflected by a sharp slump in the odds that have been offered on the election of Mr. Harding. Whether this forecasts an "election scare" or not is a question. Certain it is, however, that the larger financial interests are practically of one mind in hoping that Mr. Harding's candidacy will succeed. It is believed that he would prove strong-minded enough to bring about that sort of retrenchment in government expenses as is definitely required to place the business affairs of the nation again on a sane basis. Whether political exigencies might prevent this to an extent is neither here nor there so far as stock market sentiment is concerned. The big point is that an election scare would find stocks tumbling all around and without regard to real values just as they have tumbled from time to time this year.

It is too early to assert that the money stringency is over, which is a real and special reason for going slow in loading up with stocks on borrowed money. Maturing time loans bring a certain amount of liquidation, whether in securities or commodities, for banks generally demand that a considerable portion of most loans be paid. In consequence we may look for a decided increase in the number of commercial failures during the next few months.

When there is anything doing bullishly in the market, though, the rails seem to respond with gratifying celerity. It seems to be the definite conviction in the highest financial circles that the full effect of the rate increases has not been discounted in the market. Our standard issues, measured by any criterion of former periods, are selling at ridiculously low prices. Around 70 for stocks like Chicago and Northwestern, Great Northern, and Northern Pacific is a quotation level that will not persist forever by any means. Stocks that have shown such earning power and whose territories have shown such development as Atchison and Southern Pacific will not remain under the par mark very long.

Canadian Pacific and Union Pacific, which in former times have sold far above the 200 mark, are now returning better than 8 per cent. on their selling prices. Union Pacific, as the holder of enormous blocks of other railroad securities which naturally will enhance in value in the new scheme of things, and Canadian Pacific, with its almost limitless holdings of rich agricultural lands and vast steamship interests among others, are stocks that will prove splendidly profitable to the patient holder.

When we come to a consideration of low-priced rails we find issues like New Haven, Baltimore and Ohio, St. Paul and Rock Island, which in former days were among the very best esteemed of the so-called standard list of rails, and there is no reason why in the new order of things these issues will not be very susceptible from time to time to bullish market operations. The tremendous petroleum wealth of the country is reflected in discoveries of vastly important new oil districts, and recent developments in Montana seem to place that state more definitely on the oil map. Wyoming is coming to the front, Texas wonders continue, and there are few states west of the Mississippi that have not developed oil resources of greater or less importance.

What all this means for the railroads tapping these rich territories is discovered by a survey of the growth of gross earnings during the past few years as reported by such roads as Texas and Pacific, St. Louis and San Francisco, and St. Louis Southwestern. It would seem, indeed, that securities of the roads that are operating through the Texas and Louisiana oil fields particularly will be vastly enhanced by the business that comes from the rush for oil, and a number of low-priced stocks which had long been considered without dividend possibilities have real prospects for returning something to their owners in the future.

Generally speaking, we should be watching the market rather closely during the next few weeks for opportunities to buy at bargain levels should there come about a pinch in money or any big down swing from current prices. It will then be found that the very industrials that may have been under the severest pressure will be the ones that will enjoy the most important recoveries.

Japanese competition in our domestic markets does not menace American industry, the National Bank of Commerce in New York declares in the September issue of its magazine, Commerce Monthly. On the other hand an examination of the trade of Japan with the United States since 1914 emphasizes the important economic relationship between the two countries and, according to the bank, indicates the desirability of maintaining satisfactory mutual trade relations between them.

"The possibility of such competition on a considerable scale," says Commerce Monthly, "is to be determined partly by general conditions and partly by specific conditions in those industries where Japanese competition seems most likely."

"The first factor is distance. Yokohama is 4536 nautical miles from San Francisco, 9699 miles from New York via the Panama Canal, and 8414 statute miles by water and rail route via San Francisco. Freight charges are not a large item in the case of articles the value of which is high in relation to weight, but it is obvious that the distance makes Japanese competition a negligible factor in the heavier classes of commodities which the United States is fitted to produce either by reason of natural resources or the character of the labor supply. It is true that Japanese competition is a much more important factor on the Pacific Coast than on the Atlantic seaboard, but it is likewise true that about 90 per cent. of the population of the United States, and hence approximately the same percentage of purchasing power, is east of Denver, so that the relatively more advantageous position of Japan on the Pacific Coast is not to be regarded as constituting a serious threat to American industry."

"The second factor by which the competitive ability of the Japanese is to be measured is the relative labor cost. Ten years ago the labor cost entering into Japanese manufactured products may have been notably lower than the labor cost in the United States. Whether or not this was the case can not be said to have been proved, as wages in terms of money are not a criterion.

"In recent years, however, great changes have taken place in the labor situation in Japan. Prices have risen even more rapidly than in the United States. Wages of necessity have advanced to meet the increased cost of living. Moreover, Japanese labor is slowly growing out of its passive Orientalism and the standard of living is rising. Although it is probable that the efficiency of Japanese labor is improving as a result of changing conditions, the gain has not yet been great enough to offset the increased money cost which has taken place."

Novels by Ayala.

Students of Spanish literature will welcome this volume containing three short novels by an author well known to fame in his own land. Ayala published a collection of poems in 1903, and another thirteen years later. He produced four novels between 1908 and 1913, and three years later he gave to the world these three novels—"Prometheus," "The Fall of the House of Limon," and "Sunday Sunlight." "Prometheus" is a modern version of the wanderings of Ulysses, which end in disillusionment and failure. The other two stories are political and economic, intended to expose the evils of caciquismo, the Spanish form of "bossism." Mr. Hayward Keniston, who contributes an introduction, says: "In style these novels of Ayala mark one of the great achievements in modern prose. Their richness of vocabulary, their suppleness of phrase, and their brilliancy of color are portentous. If in the earlier works the author carries his concern for form occasionally to the point of preciousness, in the last two novels he has attained a sincerity of expression which is reminiscent of the masters of the past."

PROMETHEUS, THE FALL OF THE HOUSE OF LIMON, SUNDAY SUNLIGHT. By Ramon Pérez de Ayala. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $3.

Tanks.

Brevet-Colonel J. F. C. Fuller, D. S. O., of the British army tells us that he first saw a tank at the end of August, 1916. He became chief general staff officer of the Tank Corps about four months later, and his enthusiasm for the tank has never waned. He tells us that he is a believer in war mechanics, that is in a mechanical army which requires few men and powerful machines.

Here we have the story of the tank from its beginning, if indeed it can be said to have had a beginning, seeing that armored cars of some sort have been in use for hundreds of years. In January, 1915, Mr. Winston Churchill wrote a letter to Mr. Asquith embodying various expert suggestions that had been made to him and describing a steam tractor with armored shelters and using the caterpillar system. He believed that such a car would be able to do all that the tank eventually accomplished. The scheme was adopted and the first tanks were made. Improvements and adaptations followed each other rapidly, and although the Germans affected derision of the innovation they gave to it the flattery of imitation and speedily placed some tanks of their own in the field, besides modifying their system of defense to meet the new weapon.

Colonel Fuller devotes very little of his space to the individual exploits of tank crews, except where necessary to illustrate the capacity of the tank. But he shows us the actual part played by the tank in the great battles of the war west and east. In order to do this more effectually he gives us admirable maps of the battle lines with the changing positions of the combatants clearly shown. He tells us not only what the tanks accomplished, but of the efforts made by the Germans to find a means of resistance, efforts that in nearly all cases were unavailing. Colonel Fuller seems to have told the whole story up to date, and it is certainly a fascinating one.

TANKS IN THE GREAT WAR. By Brevet-Colonel J. F. C. Fuller, D. S. O. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $9.

The Advancing Hour.

The appearance of Mr. Norman Hapgood's name on a title-page is sufficient warning of a defense of Germanism and Bolshevism. One wonders why it is that radicalism and a noisy defense of "freedom" should always imply a championship of Germany. But so it is. It throws a valuable light upon the sincerity of the reforming extremist.

Of course there is always a plausible excuse. Mr. Hapgood believed that German domination must be stopped, but the best way to stop it was to allow Germany to win the war, or at least not to lose it. He held that Prussianism could not be cured by an overwhelming Entente victory. He agreed with Lord Lansdowne about the "knockout blow." He wanted a plebiscite for Alsace-Lorraine. He applauded the "peace without victory" speech. He sneered at the stories of German atrocities, and is so indescribably silly as to compare them with the jocular assertion of the captain of a British destroyer that he had thrown a captured submarine crew into the furnace. Whatever tends to discredit Germany is a fable. That all this is irrelevant to the subject of his book does not matter at all. It is strictly according to the formula that all books of radical reform must be prefaced by a defense of Germany.

Mr. Hapgood's attitude to Bolshevism is similar. He is not a Bolshevik. Of course not. Indeed he believes that Bolshevism is as bad as capitalism. None the less he defends the Bolsheviks. He does not believe that outrages have been committed by the Bolshevik government, nor that woman have been ill-treated. We should have met Bolshevism with sympathy and coöperation. We should have killed it with kindness. We should recognize Lenin as the head of a de facto government. Any country that allows itself to be the cat's paw of France—wicked France—"will pay a heavy penalty."

We need not follow Mr. Hapgood in his diatribes against what he calls capitalism nor into his advocacies of state control. We have heard them all before. We have also experienced some of the state control. Mr. Hapgood says that "the most reactionary great force in the country is the lawyer. The most rapid single practicable step forward would be to appoint to the Supreme Court three men who understand the nature of liberty and the facts of modern life." Doubtless Mr. Hapgood could name the men.

THE ADVANCING HOUR. By Norman Hapgood. New York: Boni & Liveright.

The Open Vision.

The author, Horatio W. Dresser, describes his book as a study of psychic phenomena, and he warns us that it is neither orthodox nor scientific, but "simply human." It is a general survey of the field without any of the usual tiresome "phenomena" and with suggested interpretations that represent the author's individual opinion. There may be those to whom these vague and saccharine philosophies are satisfying, but the more practical mind will go in search of facts and will be willing to wait for the theories until facts in sufficient volume have been secured.

THE OPEN VISION. By Horatio W. Dresser, Ph. D. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company.

Briefer Reviews

Ralph Henry Barbour is already well and favorably known as a writer of stories for boys, but in his latest volume he has the collaboration of H. P. Holt. "The Mystery of the Sea-Lark" is, as its name implies, a story of the sea, and it is so vividly written as to insure the enthusiastic appreciation of its readers. It is published by the Century Company.

The Century Company has published "Curly and the Aztec Gold," by Joseph B. Ames, comprising the further adventures of the young cowboy whose acquaintance we made in previous ranch stories. Curly and his friends discover the whereabouts of a hidden store of Aztec gold, but they meet with many adventures before they get their hands upon it. Boys should on no account overlook one of the best stories of the day.

Books on health are probably far too numerous. Moreover, each new arrival contradicts its predecessors and makes confusion worse confounded. This must not be regarded as a stricture on "Self-Habit as a Habit," by Eustace Miles, M. A., just published by E. P. Dutton & Co. and containing much apparently sensible advice on hygiene, diet, water drinking, breathing, cooking, and the use of the subconscious, whatever that may be. The price is $2.50.

Dr. Griffiths has already introduced us to the fairy stories of Holland and Belgium, and he now does the same kindly office in regard to Switzerland. The twenty-five stories that comprise the present volume, "Swiss Fairy Tales," make us familiar with the elves, sprites, and gnomes of the Alps, and while they are much like their companions in other parts of the world they have a local flavor that suggests a quite new acquaintanceship. The book is published by the Thomas Y. Crowell Company.

One is inclined flatly to deny the assertive title of Bruce Barton's new book, "It's a Good Old World," just published by the Century Company. It is by no means a good old world. The imagination of a Dante could hardly conceive of a worse one, but then optimism has become a sort of profession and it still has its votaries. None the less Mr. Barton's eulogies of things as they are contain much shrewd insight. We don't believe a word of it and we are more pessimistic than before we opened its pages—optimism always does that to us—but we like to read it.

A camera that is thought to be three times as large as any other in the world is that owned by a scientist in Chicago. With it several noted pictures have been taken, including bird's-eye views of factories and towns. It is also used for enlarging purposes.

The body of this giant camera is 9 feet 4 inches wide, 6 feet high, and 20 feet long when fully extended, and in its construction over thirty gallons of glue were used. The lens is 12 inches in diameter and cost $1500. All moving parts, including the curtain slide, run on roller bearings. The focusing is accomplished by two panels of glass, which can be moved to all parts of the field. The plate-holder weighs nearly 500 pounds when loaded and is put into the camera by means of a derrick. Great care is used in loading, as a broken plate would result in a loss of $150. The plates are made of plate glass 8 feet long by 4 feet 8 inches wide, and weigh over 200 pounds.

In order to dust the plates a man enters the camera through an opening in the front. A piece of ruby glass is then placed over the lens and the slide in the plate-holder is withdrawn. After the plate has been dusted the slide is replaced and the man steps out.

In making enlargements the focusing is done from the inside and the operator remains in the camera during the exposure. In this process the entire apparatus is supported by springs, which absorb any possible vibration.

The New Frontier.

The war has brought a new order of thinking into the world. So long as we were comfortable we were also acquiescent, but with discomfort we have become rebellious. Since it was evident that all things must be created anew why not create them upon different lines? In this way radicalism arose in America, and with it came some rather stupid efforts to suppress it by force.

Mr. Guy Emerson has a remedy for radicalism. He tells us that there is no general understanding of the American system of society and government, which took its original and essential stamp from frontier life. It is neither the radical nor the conservative stamp, but the stamp of liberalism. It must be renewed and more widely inculcated. It must be applied by the business man, the workman, the politician, and the publicist.

We may hope that Mr. Emerson's voice is not that of one crying in the wilderness, but we suspect that it is. The old frontier days belong to ancient history, and the advent of many millions of immigrants lies between the present and the past. It is comparatively easy to formulate a new Ten Commandments, to say that this, that, and the other must be done. But how are they to be done? How are ideals to be revived without great national spokesmen to revive them? How, for example, shall we combat the fatal tendency now prevalent all over the world to abandon the powers of government to vociferous and selfish organizations of small minorities? Such evils would, of course, disappear if there were to be an acceptance of Mr. Emerson's precepts. But it is a large "if," and time presses.

THE NEW FRONTIER. By Guy Emerson. New York: Henry Holt & Co.

All Things Are Possible.

Leo Shestov has written many books on philosophy and literature, but the present volume, translated from the Russian by S. S. Kotliansky, is the first to come under the general attention of the Western public. It consists mainly of general reflections upon life, and perhaps it is as typical of the current Russian spirit as anything that we have.

Russia for many centuries was excluded from the domain of the world's thought. Then to a certain extent she passed under its control. Now, having experienced it, she rejects it and fashions a thought of her own, or at least tries to. We, whose minds have been in a mold for ages, marvel at the anarchy of it all, for whatever is unmoored, whatever is spontaneous, we regard as chaotic. The Russian is opening his traditionless mind upon the world. He is like the man who was born blind and now sees. Accepted opinions mean nothing to him. For him there is nothing sacred in axioms or truisms. They are neither axioms nor truisms to him. He asks the meaning of good and evil, pleasure and pain. Are they any more than the preferences of human nature, its likes and dislikes? What is vice and what is virtue? Naturally we resent such questions. Did we not settle them long ago? We have our automatic replies ready for delivery, but such writers as Shestov make us hesitate for a moment. Do we actually know as much as we think we do? He is as disconcerting as a child. He sends us back to first principles and we feel a little abashed.

The Flying Legion.

This is a somewhat fanciful story of an airship journey into Africa and Asia. A company of war aviators, weary of their dull and inactive lives, gain possession of a gigantic aeroplane with all sorts of hitherto undreamed-of appliances and set forth upon their great adventure. Every member of the crew is an ace and decorated, and when we learn that a beautiful woman has introduced herself into the company in disguise we anticipate all sorts of more or less pleasant happenings. Although the story is somewhat extravagant, it is excellently told, and with creditable attention to the conditions of Mohammedan life in the East.

Motion Study.

This book was inspired by the war and by the necessity to find occupation for disabled men. To what extent could they be trained to use machines, and to what extent could the machines be modified to meet the disabilities of the operator? Obviously the training of the man was the more important factor. The curtailment of his powers of motion demanded a fuller utilization of his remaining capacities, and the way in which this might be brought about is the subject of this lucid and well-illustrated volume.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

Julius Magnussen, author of "God's Smile," D. Appleton & Co.'s volume dealing with problems of spiritualism, was until very recently noted throughout Scandinavia as a confirmed materialist and actively averse to anything associated with the supernatural or mystical.

Mrs. Elloe Lowndes has become famous as a weaver of mysterious plots. She is the author of "Good Old Anna," "Lilla," "Love and Hatred," and now "The Lonely House" from her pen comes from the George H. Doran Company.

Readers interested in the general subject of India will find worth-while reading in Sir Verney Lovett's admirable book, "A History of the Indian Nationalist Movement" (Frederick A. Stokes Company). The author has been closely allied with diplomatic affairs in the Indian service for thirty-five years and India's efforts for Home Rule, which culminated in the bill in 1919 providing an Indian constitution, are lucidly and interestingly traced from the beginning of British rule in Asia.

Among his best-known books are: Travel—"A Wanderer in London," "A Wanderer in Venice," etc.; novels—"The Vermilion Box," "Over Bremerton's"; essays—"Cloud and Silver," "A Boswell of Baghdad." He is the author of many delightful books for children, and the biographer of Charles Lamb. His latest novel, "Verena in the Midst," will be published this autumn.

A second edition before publication is announced for "Mac of Placid," a new novel by T. Morris Longstreth. Mr. Longstreth will be remembered as the author "The Adirondacks" and "The Catskills," two books of travel and enthusiasm with a touch of Stevenson and the shrewd woods-wisdom of John Burroughs. Once he was a schoolteacher. Now he lives in the Adirondacks all the year round.

A Disagreeable Experience.

The French are fond of saying that one "spends a bad quarter of an hour" when it is his lot to endure some disagreeable experience. No one could have spent a worse quarter of an hour than an Englishman during a visit to St. Lucia, in the West Indies. This gentleman had been hospitably entertained by the neighboring planters, who, as he was preparing to return, had sent him gifts of guava jelly, fine jams, limes, peppers, and the like. Among other gifts he received a live fer-de-lance, one of the deadliest serpents in the world, a specimen of which he had been anxious to obtain. While waiting to have a box made for his unpleasant pet he kept it in the glass jar in which it had been sent, replacing the glass stopper with a piece of perforated zinc. He then placed the jar on the table. One afternoon, while seated near by watching the snake he fell asleep. He was awakened by a tremendous crash as of glass. It was pitch dark—there being no twilight in those latitudes. His first thought, of course, was of the fer-de-lance. Not realizing that his slippers had fallen off he started to rush from the room, when he felt what seemed to be a slight blow on the foot, followed by a burning pain. He instantly drew himself up in the chair, in dread of a second bite, and made frantic efforts to suck the wound. Failing in that, he held out the foot so that it would bleed freely and tried to put a ligature about the ankle, calling madly for help all the time. The servants, hearing him cry that the fer-de-lance was loose, were afraid to come in, but at last his host appeared with lights and ready to despatch the serpent. They found the snake still in the jar upon the table. The cause of the alarm was the fall of a jar of hot pickles, which was also standing on the table, and which had been overturned in some way. As the Briton's foot struck the floor it was cut by one of the pieces of broken glass and the acid of the pickles in the wound produced the pain.

Dr. Sim Wallace, who is well known at the London Hospital, joined in a Manchester conference on the prevention of diseases of the teeth. He boldly declared that decay is caused solely by the kind of food we eat, and advised uncooked fruit as a means of keeping the mouth physiologically clean. Cocoa and chocolate, it appears, are not good for this purpose, but tea, coffee, and beer are. Dry champagne, too, is excellent. An excuse for drinking it at present prices: it saves a dentist's bill.—London Chronicle.

L'ADMIRABLE CRICHTON.

In June, 1920, at the Théâtre Antoine, Alfred Athis' French adaptation of J. M. Barrie's ever delightful comedy, "The Admirable Crichton," was placed before the French public. To his credit he it said the French adapter fully retained the English atmosphere of the original piece. No attempt was made to adapt the piece to French ideas, although it is called an adaptation rather than a translation. But the Continental translators are fairer than the British or American translators of foreign plays. What they seek to do is to render the original as faithfully as can be done, so as best to interpret to their own countrymen the minds, thoughts, and traditions of the foreigner. This Mons. Athis has faithfully done. He knows how it is himself, having had a translation of his own vaudeville-comedy, "Le Bout-en-train," acted in London the year (1908) that "The Admirable Crichton" first came out. Ever since then he has cherished the idea of translating Barrie's piece and having it brought out in Paris.

Just how successful it was and how interesting to the Gallic taste we are not fully informed; but it had a good reception, although the critic of La Renaissance intimates that the inability of the play to achieve a success equal to that attained by the original in London only proves that the French do not understand the English; "car," says this French critic, "cette histoire-là, vous savez, cette histoire, en soi intrinsèque, c'est beaucoup plus vraie que 'Ruy Blas' et singulièrement plus profonde!"

This is rather soothing to the feelings of an Anglo-Saxon appreciator of Mr. Barrie's comedy, for the perspicacious critic of Le

Journal writes of it as if it were a play gotten up exclusively for juvenile tastes. However, this gentleman, among the group of critics quoted, seems to stand alone, the rest perceiving the profound social significance of Mr. Barrie's theory, which does not protrude itself, nor become a sermon or a moral so pointed as to spoil a highly amusing comedy. But it leaves reflection behind, and now, a dozen years after the play was written, and the great wave of democracy horn of the war has swept over the world, one discovers on a re-reading that the play, in spite of its dozen years of age, has become timely.

I am inclined to think that in America we did not display the same insight in comprehending Mr. Barrie's root idea as the French commentators. Many, the majority in fact, thought that the theme of "The Admirable Crichton" was the essential quality of human beings, and that the failure of Lord Loam's monthly tea to his domestic, due to his insistence of the social equality between his family and his servants, was because the equality idea was a mere toy and pretense. It was comic when carried out in Lord Loam's drawing-room, because people naturally gravitate toward their own kind, and look with scarcely-veiled hostility on those in another rank in life if social intercourse is sought.

When Lord Loam's yachting party was wrecked on the desert isle, again the instinctive—this time—leveling of social barriers failed to work. The servitor became the dictator; a benevolent despot whose word was law; while by the three ex-gentlemen and subject men on the island "Tweeny," who was an excellent cook and a first-class worker, was looked up to.

In fact, we may, according to the critic of L'Opinion, regard the idea of universal social equality as a mirage, and, by practical demonstration in his play, Mr. Barrie has shown it as such.

However, the adherent of the democratic idea may take heart of grace. At least the comedy shows up the hollowness of the idea that rank does anything for the natural-born fool, such as Lord Loam and his nephew, except to make him more of a fool. Give the man of real ability a foothold and his essential strength and initiative will count. But if we are going to accept Mr. Barrie's ideas we will have to disabuse our minds of the impression that a real democracy is going to prevail.

Several other plays, it seems, in which the adventures of a group wrecked on a desert isle was the subject, have been played in France, the one most interesting in the working out of the central idea having been the oldest. This is "Le Crocodile," a dramatic comedy by Victorien Sardou, which was put on at the Porte-Saint-Martin in 1886.

Victorien Sardou's ability as a writer of plays has been frightfully traduced in the eyes of the American public by the ineptitude and sickly conventionality of the translations of his numerous pieces produced, during their heyday, in America. We accepted them at their apparent value, and some of his finest works were never produced here at all. Only his most stogy and superficial plays were considered worthy of the American public. In "Le Crocodile" Sardou, like Barrie, had a number, greatly increased in his play, who represented the diverse elements on a passenger ship, cast on a desert island. Sardou works out the resultant clash of authoritative personalities from the political point of view; competition, the election of a chief, plots and counterplots, a revolt—"tout un microcosme de l'humanité."

It would be most interesting to see this piece put, in translated form, on the American stage during this era of political experimentation. But it won't be done. It might induce thought, and on the American stage thought and the play-going public are enemies. It is disheartening to realize how many good plays moulder in closets while superficial rot swaggers under the favoring eye of the public.

However, there are the "little theatres." They cater to a public that wants the play of ideas put on the stage. Naturally, since a complete commercialism is not the aim such theatres can not afford to have the finest talent. However, their managers do their best, and so, for that matter, do their players.

About September 12th or 13th the Maitland Theatre will reopen with an augmented company of patrons. But what is going to interest its patrons more particularly is the line of plays its manager will put on. He has trained us to be expectant.

At the Players' Club Theatre on Bush Street they are going to introduce an innovation. They will revive their principal successes, such as "Hamlet" and "Richard III," and, with a number of other productions to balance the Shakespearean plays, offer the whole in repertory in a fall and spring season.

Mr. Maitland has been the agency of our becoming acquainted by means of stage representation, with plays by such famous writers as Shaw, Ibsen, Wilde, Galsworthy, Henry Arthur Jones, Stanley Houghton, Dunsany, and others. The works of some of these authors have also received representation on the stage of the Players Club Theatre. But there is one stage writer, not really great in ideas but almost supreme in stage technic, several of whose best plays have never been played on this Coast. Pinero's "Iris," "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," "His House in Order," "Lady Bountiful" are among those of his more dramatic plays that have been seen on the San Francisco boards. But they have never played here "The Thunderbolt," "Mid-Channel," "The Benefit of the Doubt," "Lotty," "The Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith." We have been luckier with the more conventionally disposed Henry Arthur Jones. But he has written so many that some—"Whitewashing Julia," "Joseph Entangled," "Mary Goes First," and others—have been overlooked.

Both these dramatists are supremely playwrights who immediately catch and absorb the attention of the public. They are capital story-tellers. Every one of their plots is interesting. So are their characters. Their dialogue is generally done with brilliant success, and their technic is usually irreproachable. Yet we have had an incomplete acquaintance with the more modern and brilliant works of these two accomplished writers. Dare we hope that either Mr. Maitland or Mr. Travers will come to the rescue before time has quite put them out of the ring?

OPERA AT THE AUDITORIUM.

Mr. Frank Healy seems to be the discoverer of the possibilities of the Exposition Auditorium when suitable attractions are supplied. With Galli-Curci as the operatic star he filled it two successive Sundays last winter, and with McCormick, the tenor, he drew capacity houses for three Sundays running. Mr. Healy has won the confidence of the public, not only by the quality of his star attractions, but by the expert way that his staff handles the huge crowds that have filled the Exposition Auditorium.

And now he is going to try it again. On October 4th the Scotti Grand Opera Company will open in "La Bohème" at the Exposition Auditorium, which is having a special stage and orchestra pit constructed, projecting so far into the Auditorium as to reduce its seating capacity one-half. Mr. Antonio Scotti carries his own equipment for lighting and stage effects, his drop curtain, scenic sets, and stage rigging.

The company, including the ballet and chorus, will number 150 people. Mr. Scotti has engaged Gennaro Papo, leading conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Carlo Peroni, leading conductor of the Scotti Grand Opera Company on its past three tours. For general stage director he has secured Armando Agnini, stage manager of the Metropolitan Opera House, while he has the cordial assistance of Giulio Gatti-Casazza, well known as the general director of the Metropolitan Opera House.

The repertory, as announced, will be covered in eight performances, "La Bohème," "Faust," "La Tosca," "Il Trovatore," "Madame Butterfly," and Leon's "L'Oracolo," in connection with hy turns "Pagliacci" and "Cavalleria Rusticana," for a novel attraction, being the last announced.

The singers, led by Mr. Scotti, are members of the Metropolitan Opera House Company and have all held long-continued engagements there on account of their ability. The sale of season tickets is over, but that tickets for single performances is still on at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s box-office.

Measuring Garden Water

"You say that a garden can be watered properly with 3 cubic feet of water per square yard of garden space per month.

"Are you sure that this amount of water will keep the garden green and growing?"

The question was put to the garden expert in our Service Department.

For answer he showed the account of a householder who has a big house and garden on Russian Hill, one of many cases where garden water is used with intelligent economy to keep up a beautiful garden. Here is the account:

	Consumption.	Cost.
Jan.	3500 cubic feet	$9.34
Feb.	3700 "	9.76
March	3600 "	9.55
April	3400 "	8.78
May	3300 "	8.57
June	5400 "	13.33
July	4800 "	12.07
Aug.	5000 "	12.49

Average consumption during the non-irrigation period was 3500 cubic feet. During the three months of garden irrigation it has been 5000 cubic feet.

So 1500 cubic feet per month is the garden use of water.

The garden space irrigated, our records show, is 500 square yards. Therefore this householder used just 3 cubic feet per square yard per month.

This lover of flowers measures his garden consumption.

He knows that a half-inch hose with nozzle delivers about one cubic foot of water per minute, and he waters accordingly.

was the all-engrossing one when "The Four Horsemen" advanced to the charge. And the Allied world was well pleased at the good, sturdy, healthy hatred that Ibañez showed for the Teuton. Besides, he has considerable ability in vivid descriptiveness. Those descriptions of the battle of the Marne will help toward giving the book a future, although at present we are done with it, war being an unpopular topic with the mercenary world.

Then came "Mare Nostrum." I have just read—or no, near-read—"Woman Triumphant" and "Mare Nostrum," and I have decided, to my own satisfaction at least, that Ibañez is not a truly great novelist.

True, I am obliged to remind myself continually that he is a Latin, and the Latin point of view is essentially different from ours. But so was Victor Hugo a Latin. His books had absurdities and extravagances, and yet he was truly great. He was an independent thinker and was in advance of his own time. He offered lofty and inspiring thoughts, and he stirred men's souls to spiritual exaltation. Besides, he was a great humanitarian; "Les Misérables" alone is the proof.

Of these three books by Ibañez the finest passages are those in "The Four Horsemen" bearing on the war; the rhapsody of the Russian in Paris showed elevation of sentiment in its honor and condemnation of the scourge of war which destroys the innocent and desolates the earth.

But in "Mare Nostrum," in "Woman Triumphant" I do not recall a single inspiring thought. Both books are very faultily prolix. In "Mare Nostrum" there are pages and pages of dullness. In "Woman Triumphant" the author dwells tediously on the same idea; the jealousy of the wife, the revived love of the widower. It took Ibañez 132 pages in "Mare Nostrum" to settle down to the telling of his story. Up to that time he had bored us considerably with the character of the old seaman known as "the Triton." Also he introduced numerous lengthy passages numbering scores of pages of a descriptive, or of a geographic, or of a historic, or of an oceanic-mythological nature.

I could not but think of the admirable economizing of the resources of the great Russian novelist while I was reading "Mare Nostrum." Turgenyev always devoted himself to writing a novel which should be a work of art; Ibañez makes me think of the Sunday editions of the dailies. He is a well-informed man, and he won't let you forget it when the business of the moment is supposed to be novel-writing.

He is guide-booky in "Mare Nostrum." I am well persuaded that a man of his information, his powers of description, and ready fluency could write books that would appeal to the seeker after information. But he mixes in too much of this sort of thing with his story. Turgenyev paints the Russian atmosphere and depicts Russians, but his books are never over-long. Ibañez—perhaps to please his American readers—has given a terrifically verbose review of his hero's boyhood, of his early impressions, and of aspects of the life lived in Valencia.

When the amour with Freya begins the author settles down to business. His theme is, I should judge, a congenial one. In order, however, to draw an analogy between Freya and the monstrous and malignant cuttle-fish the author pauses and in a chapter of nearly 12,000 words makes a brilliant display of his erudition concerning the undersea inhabitants of the Naples Aquarium. It is very complete, but I confess to being willing to travel on through life without gaining such a profusion of impressions concerning these diverse sea species. For, if I wanted the information, I would, like the student in an art museum, inform myself as a task. Ibañez was altogether too lavish with his information in a work of fiction.

However, this chapter precedes the business of the book, which is to give, with a great multiplicity of appeal to the reader's grosser forms of interest, a minute account of the amour that ensues.

Freya is an elegant and beautiful courtesan. The novelist can always interest in such a theme if he is sufficiently well informed. But the healthy-minded reader is sure to become satiated with the stifling animalism of the recital in "Mare Nostrum." If he is really healthy-minded he is sure to skip.

And, after all, what is there in the character either of Freya or Ulysses to write such a lengthy, ponderous, and portentous book about? Freya is just a courtesan, her horrible, painful, luxurious life of sexual slavery having developed in her abnormal tendencies. Ulysses is a frank, generous, brave, virile "Meridional," a term the author frequently uses to describe him. He is wholly a materialist about women, as are so many of the Latins; as is Ibañez himself. It is written in his countenance. And that is about all there is to Ulysses.

When the German spy idea begins to develop the story immediately grows in interest, and there is a certain impressiveness in the description of the end of the woman. But one asks one's self, "What is there about this pair that is worthy of a book of some 177,000 words?"

I have an idea that Ibañez wishes to be considered a Spanish Balzac, and no doubt he may be considered to have some claims to the title. He knows much of life, and the world, and the human family. Like Balzac, he is a fecund, untrifling writer, without being a stylist. But his view of humanity is limited by his greater interest in the species whose joy in living is confined to the appeasing of the grosser appetites. To Ibañez I should say that the majority of people who conform, who live regular, conscientious, and conventional lives, are dull.

It is so that he depicts the jealous wife in "Woman Triumphant." She becomes dreadfully tedious as the book advances. And when she is comfortably dead, and the reader heaves a sigh of relief, he proceeds to kindle a posthumous love for the once graceful and lovely model in the bosom of the husband, whose infidelities no reasonable person could condemn, since the wife was a steady nagger, but whose abnormal revival of his passion for the dead wife of his youth is unpleasant and repellent.

A great novelist must base the appeal in his books on something universal in human nature. Ibañez does not. He does not, apparently, feel any sympathy with our better impulses, and he seems to believe that the average reader likes to read of the fleshly, the horrible, and the base.

Freya was entirely horrible, and when Ulysses found the strength to resist her it was solely from an instinct of self-preservation.

Having read, with liberal skipping, these three books of Ibañez, I am now content to dismiss him comfortably from any further consideration. He may write other and finer novels yet. His articles about Mexico and about the Republican convention showed the keen, analytic observer. But his view of human nature is, on the whole, distinctly arid and depressing, and I doubt very much if his vogue will continue with Anglo-Saxon readers.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Curran Theatre.

There is not a dull moment in "Mamma's Affair," the Harvard prize comedy that enters upon its last week's engagement at the Curran Theatre Monday evening. Oliver Morosco, its producer, is presenting his original company intact, Effie Shannon, Robert Edeson, Amelia Bingham, Katherine Kaelred, Ida St. Leon, George Le Guere, and Little Billy giving it the finish that it is rarely our good fortune to enjoy.

The usual Wednesday and Saturday matinees are to be given.

The Alcazar Theatre.

The frivolities of "Parlor, Bedroom and Bath" at the Alcazar this week give place next Sunday matinée, for a single week, to the humors of "39 East," a comedy by Rachel Crothers. Miss Crothers is very expert in drawing characters that are typical and essentially human. The romance involves an unsophisticated Western girl who goes to the big city with artistic aspirations and lands in the chorus and a frivolous young Broadway rounder who becomes first a shallow admirer and then an ardent lover. With the exception of a picturesque episode in Central Park, the entire action passes in a boarding-house of "the better class" peopled by decayed gentle folks who live in the past, the vulgarians who frankly live in the present, the landlady with her affected elegances, the sharp-tongued spinster, the foreign nobleman, and other types that are vivid. Inez Ragan, Dudley Ayres, and the Alcazar favorites, with special reinforcements, will interpret this unique play quivering with the vitalities of real life. Monday night, September 13th, is given over to the Nationale Ligue Francaise for the benefit of the French Library, an annual event of social and artistic significance.

"Daddies" so took the town by storm a fortnight ago that unsatisfied public demand compels its farewell revival the week commencing September 19th.

The Orpheum.

Announcement for the Orpheum bill next week is couched in the form of an invitation. In the words of the announcement you are invited to a delicious spread of the best. The host and hostesses in this party, which will continue throughout the entire week, will stage their affair "Under the Apple Tree." John Sully will wait on the guests, and an even dozen of attractive belles will be there. "Under the Apple Tree" is a musical play of thumbnail proportions.

Comedy will find its scope in a playlet called "Follow On." This is a combination of stage and Salvation Army atmosphere. A burlesque company comes to grief, but among the members is a Salvation Army girl who teaches them the meaning of "Follow On."

Sidney Phillips will offer several songs and stories. Few are said to have the natural knack of singing a song or telling a story better than he.

Jack Cahill and Don Romine will present an amusing skit called "A Comedy Mix-Up," which is a combination of two accepted types of stage characterization, a black face and an Italian.

Reno, one of the newest and most successful pantomimists, and Jackie and Billie, thinking and talking birds, are other new features. Miss Ioleen will mingle a good voice with her skill on a slack wire.

Emma Haig, star of the present week, is the only holdover to be found on the new bill.

The Maitland Playhouse.

George Bernard Shaw's drama, "The Devil's Disciple," will be presented this coming week at the opening of the 1920-21 season of the Maitland Playhouse on Stockton Street above Post. Arthur Maitland will appear in the leading rôle originated so successfully by Richard Mansfield, while Miss Betty Oliver, the new leading lady, will take the part portrayed by Mansfield's wife, Miss Cameron.

Other members of the Maitland company include Caroline Howard, Selby Roach, a character actor of no mean reputation and ability, Richenda Stevick, Taylor Graves, Elmer Horton, and Charles McQuarrie.

The Maitland Players have been strengthened for the coming season, which has promise of good things of the theatre. The opening play of the season will be open to the general

One of the biggest mistakes that can be made is to suppose that men with capital are living for themselves alone. They can not do it, no matter how hard and cold and cruel their hearts may be. The money has got to work; they have for themselves only the trifling amount which they can spend upon themselves; the rest of it is continually occupied in providing a means for others to make a living. Economic laws were not made by the devil; they were formed by the same divinity which has created all the world's laws. Wherever there is wealth there is good employment; wherever capital is destroyed there is destruction. There may be selfishness, which is regrettable for the ruin it causes to the individual, but the bulk of every fortune goes out in wages, or else the fortune disappears. Without production wealth must vanish; it can not exist without continually providing a new source of saving, investment, and increased wages. Charity does not count; capital has got to work to save itself.—Albany Knickerbocker Press.

VANITY FAIR.

"A friend of mine," says a correspondent of the Villager, "has showed me a few of the things you have said about fashions, and they are silly. You have not grasped the idea of fashions; you do not know what you are talking about. The way you use the term, 'being in the fashion,' shows you fail to realize it is no question of being in the fashion. The last thing really smart people, the better sort, want is to be in the fashion; what they have to try for continually is to be out of it. When all the stenographers and cooks begin wearing full skirts and long sleeves, we simply have to wear tight skirts and short sleeves; if we don't, will you please tell me how we should ever be noticed, how we should be distinguishable from the lower classes?"

"I have no doubt you think this easy enough to be unimportant. I don't want to insinuate, because I never saw you nor your family, and don't know anything about you except this paper you write, but you must be aware that dowdiness never has to work hard to be conspicuous. For those, however, to whom dowdiness is against the law of nature, really something fundamental, the struggle to be conspicuous is becoming almost intolerable—I can't begin to describe what a problem it is growing to be. I'm for democracy first, last, and all the time, but I firmly believe there will be perfect chaos in our national life if something is not done to prevent the masses copying every innovation in clothes almost before it is on our backs. Do you not see that this sort of thing is destroying the values of life? I see you mention the menace of the proletariat, but you haven't the faintest notion what that menace really is. What use is it any more to buy Paris frocks? When every one is wearing things long and sleeves to the wrists, you pay two or three hundred dollars for something exclusive with no sleeves and nearly no skirt, and in a week there will not be a soul to turn and stare at you; in a week your own cook will be walking down the avenue on her afternoon off, showing her knees and her shoulders.

"We saw how bad things were getting some time ago, and we decided on a desperate measure. We began wearing evening styles on the streets—ermine wraps, satin shoes, décolleté and all; we argued if the crowd had no nice feelings to restrain them from encroaching on us there was but one thing to do, and that was to put the styles beyond the reach of their pocketbooks. It was thought, too, that by introducing street clothes that would leave the body merely veiled from the waist up, the lower classes would be debarred; in the first place, they would hesitate to show their coarse lingerie, and in the second place, they had always evidenced a strong prudishness, and this would make them reluctant to wear positively indecent clothes.

"How mistaken we were! They have been making such a disgusting amount of money in the last few years that a squirrel wrap is an easy purchase for them, and as for their principles, they simply have none! Without a qualm, they have set all their scruples aside and are copying our morals as well as our fashions—I tell you, the destruction of civilization must be the result of it all!

"What most people who talk so glibly do not realize is that more than clothes is involved in our obligations—we have to keep out of the fashion in morals and ideas, too. When the mob got so set on virtue and Christianity and all that sort of thing, our people had to make a change, but lately the commonest creatures have taken to following our lead, and truly I don't see what will be the outcome! I don't really see how much further we can go. As it stands today, you can not tell any one of us from . . . here, my dear sir, I suppose I shall have to euphemize, for if I use a plain, twentieth-century word, you will cut this whole passage out; it humiliates me to concede to your prudishness, but I will say you can not tell any of our class from the 'daughters of joy'—I assume that would be your delicate phrase!—except by our conversation. They have merely their experience, while we are able to talk Freud; I worked among these women before it got fashionable, and I found that they would not think of saying in public things which don't bother me at all.

"But if the lower classes are making it impossible for any one dining in a restaurant to know which are—again, my dear sir, I yield!—which are the daughters of joy and the better people, and which mere clerks and perfectly decent women, then what are we going to do? Probably you would reply to this query by saying that in desperation we shall be driven to virtue by way of keeping our prominence. But there again you betray your lack of knowledge. Analogy is a broken reed, my dear Villager. Once hoop skirts and bustles have been left behind, you can go back to them; you can really 'revive' fashion. But you can not revive morals and philosophies; when it comes to these, you must always have something new, otherwise you are a reactionary, and that means you are getting old. But how is it possible to keep on having exclusive ideas? Now, all of us have been to considerable trouble about Bolshevism, and it looks as if this season Bolshevism was going to be nowhere at all. And why? Just because a lot of cheap, new-rich upstarts have discovered it sounds smart to have money and then say you are for Debs and Trotsky, and of course right away it has ceased to be smart, just like the new poetry.

"You have sometimes spoken of us, sir, as 'the leisure class.' I trust this mere sketch of our problems and our responsibilities will convince you that the term is most inopportune.

"I shall not sign my name, for that would just afford you the pleasure of leaving it off and denying me even the little publicity your obscure sheet might furnish. I will let it go with the assurance that I am not very often

"YOUR READER."

TRACING A COUNTERFEIT.

The tracing of counterfeit bills back to the person responsible for their issue is a curious and exciting employment. The experts assigned by the government to this work are among the most skillful members of the Secret Service. The protection of the currency depends in large measure upon their efficiency, and the pains they take are almost infinite. A strange story told by one of these operatives illustrates the difficulties which they meet and overcome.

One day a bank clerk in Cincinnati detected a counterfeit twenty-dollar bill in the deposit of a small retail grocer. The operative was sent for and undertook the case.

He found that the grocer received the bill from a shoe dealer, who had it from a dentist, who had it from somebody else, and so on, until finally the Secret Service man traced it to an invalid woman who had used it to pay her physician. When questioned, she said the money had been sent to her by her brother, who lived in New Orleans.

The operative looked up her brother's pedigree, and was certain that he was the man wanted. He had a bad record, was the proprietor of a dive and was just the sort of person to be a confederate of counterfeiters. The operative went to New Orleans with the handcuffs in his pocket, but he was a little premature.

The man proved to the detective's complete satisfaction that he had received the money as rent for a small house he owned in Pittsburgh. The operative took the next train for Pittsburgh.

The tenant of the house proved to be a traveling oculist, who spent most of his time on the road. He was then away in the West, but the operative saw him on his return and he at once recognized the bill. It had been given him by a patient in Cincinnati, the very point from which the operative had started.

The patient was a boss carpenter. The Secret Service man got his address from the oculist and made a beeline for Cincinnati. He had a premonition that something was going to happen, and he wasn't disappointed.

The carpenter was an honest old fellow, and told the detective without hesitation that he had received the bill from Mr. Smith for repairing his barn. Mr. Smith was the small grocer in whose bank deposit the counterfeit had turned up. The detective flew to his store as fast as a taxi could carry him and found it closed. He had left town. His shop, it was proved, was a mere blind.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Harry Carey, the movie star, has a ranch near Los Angeles. He boasted of how he raised his own foodstuffs, cattle and hogs, but added "even at that it's not on what you could call a really independent, self-supporting basis." "How's that?" asked his friend. "Well," said Harry, "I still have to buy my gasoline in town, and so far I haven't been able to raise any silk shirts for my gang to wear on Sunday."

A farmer was the father of twelve children, all of whom had been rocked in the same cradle by the same great toe. He was rocking the newest arrival one night when his wife remarked: "John, that cradle is nearly worn out; it's so rickety that I'm afraid it will fall to pieces." "It's about used up," replied her husband. Then, handing her $10, he added: "The next time you go to town get a new one, a good one, one that will last."

Frederick was sitting on the curb, crying, when Billy came along and asked him what was the matter. "Oh, I feel so bad 'cause Major's dead—my nice old collie!" sobbed Frederick. "Shucks!" said Billy. "My grandmother's been dead a week, and you don't catch me crying." Frederick gave his eyes and nose a swipe with his hand, and, looking up at Billy, sobbed, despairingly: "Yes, but you didn't raise your grandmother from a pup."

Leaning against the fence of a cottage garden stood a diminutive urchin, sobbing as though his heart was dangerously near the breaking point. A benevolent old man approached him. "What is the matter, my child?" he inquired soothingly. The youth only roared the louder. "My father," he howled, "has been heatin' me." "Come, come!" said the old man, "you mustn't cry like that! All fathers have to heat their boys at times. You must cheer up and forget all about it." Then the small boy looked at him with a scornful glare. "Ah!" he said slowly. "I might forget it if my father was an ordinary sort o' man; but"—and here tears burst forth once more—"he plays the big drum in a brass band."

Rex Beach was motoring through northern Minnesota. He admits that he was aware that the roads in that part of the state were not traveled over much and wasn't looking for any boulevards de luxe, but just the same he began to have misgivings when the road plunged into a swamp where they had to lower the top to get beneath the bows of the tamaracks. "Do many cars travel this road?" asked Beach of some children who happened along. "Oh, yes, sir," they chorused. "Lots of 'em. One came last year, and one this year, and now you're here."

A correspondent of the New York Sun sent in the following translation of a Chinese rejection slip, used in returning would-be contributions: "We have read thy manuscript with infinite delight. Never before have we reveled in such a masterpiece. If we printed it the authorities would ordain us to take it for a model, and henceforth never print anything inferior to it. As it would be impossible to find its equal within ten thousand years, we are compelled, though shaken with sorrow, to return your divine manuscript, and for doing so we beg one thousand pardons."

A young lawyer had a foreign client in police court the other day. It looked rather black for the foreigner and the youthful attorney fairly outdid himself in trying to convince the magistrate that his client was innocent of the charge brought. The attorney dwelt on the other's ignorance of American customs, his straightforward story, and upon other details sufficient to extend the talk fully fifteen minutes. His client was acquitted. In congratulating the freed man the lawyer held out his hand in an absent but rather suggestive manner. The client grasped it firmly. "Eet was verra fine noise you mak'," he said. "Mocha thanks. Goo-hy."

"Is this—can it be love?" sighed Angehella, as she sat on a seat in the park with MacCuthbert's arm around her waist and his soft voice whispering fondly in her ear. Oh, it was lovely! "It is, my darling," MacCuthbert assured her. "But tell me, sweet one, how do you feel?" "I feel," cooed the lady, "as though my heart would leap from my throbbing breast! My parched throat contracts and then expands, while my breath comes in quick, choking sobs." There was a sudden rustle in the bushes behind them as a sleeping tramp crawled forth and glowered at them. "I'd take something for it, miss," he growled. "That aint love you've got; it's hiccups."

Over steaming teacups the two damsels sat and talked. The conversation turned upon an unfortunate individual who had incurred the disfavor of one of them. "No, I never did like him," she said. "Why, when he used to write me glowing love letters I would only glance over them once." "Only once, dear?" "Well—er—sometimes when I couldn't make out his abominable scrawl I would glance over them a second time." "Indeed!" said the other maiden, "and was that all?" "Except sometimes at night, I would take them from under my pillow and read them just to kill time." "And that was the end?" "Yes," was the reply; "only on rainy days I used to look over them again just to see how silly a man can be when he starts writing love letters. But I only glanced over them, dear. I never did like him."

The enthusiastic English literary light had consented to deliver a lecture in a small village club on Burns. For weeks beforehand the hillboards were covered with announcements, and when the appointed night came the hall was full to overflowing. He began with "The Cotter's Saturday Night," "Tam O'Shanter," and "The Jolly Beggars," and was proceeding with "John Anderson" when there came an interruption from the back of the hall. "What is it, my man?" inquired the lecturer. "When are you goin' to give us a few hints on burns?" came the reply. "Hints?" replied the puzzled lecturer. "Yes, hints," growled the man. "I paid three pence to come in 'cos you was supposed to know all about burns, an' there you stand spoutin' poetry like a parrot, while my missus, who's upset a saucepan o' hoilin' water on 'er foot, is waitin' to hear whether she'd better souse it wi' nil or shake the flour dredger over it."

A Washington reporter, happening to pass the St. Elizabeth's Hospital for the Insane, noticed an inmate standing and painting a wall with a dry brush. The reporter, somewhat of a sportsman, noticed a racing sheet in the back pocket of the painter, and thinking to have a little fun, he said: "Who are you picking today?" "Take little Eva in the fourth race at Laurel," said the painter. "She's a 200-to-1 shot and she's carrying eighty-eight pounds; she can't lose." The reporter, perhaps thinking one lunch as good as another, went down to the office, drew out $25 advance salary and put it all on Little Eva. Then Little Eva stumbled on the first quarter and was out of the race. About two weeks later the reporter was passing the hospital and he again noticed the painter, busily painting with a dry brush. "Well," he said to the painter, "I put $25 on Little Eva at 200 to 1, carrying eighty-eight pounds, in the fourth race. She stumbled on the first quarter and lost." "You took my tip?" said the painter. "Yes," said the reporter. "Get a brush," said the painter.

THE MERRY MUSE.

Through the Week.
On Monday she swore that she'd always be mine;
On Tuesday her mood seemed to change.
Came Wednesday, she yawned when I said she looked fine,
And I thought her demeanor seemed strange.
On Thursday she said that I bored her to death,
Which I took for a very bad sign;
On Friday we quarreled—on Saturday, too—
And I hastened away to repine.
But her mood changed again when the week started new,
And on Sunday—she swore she'd be mine.
—G. R. Brunjes in American Legion Weekly.

Ballade of Research.
Through annals of lost laughter I had sought,
Through legendary cacklings ploughed;
Weighed this primeval grin, that giggle, caught
Between two slabs of papyrus shroud;
Catalogued chuckles by the Sphinx endowed
And winked a course back to Thermopylae—
Ere I should be equipped to cry aloud
The joke that never was on land and sea.

One thousand sixty variants I brought
To book of the half-portion husband cowed
By corpulent helpmeet; of the distraught
Endymion caroling, though over-frauded.
Another thousand; specimens of the proud
Parent and his superior progeny:
These had all to be winnowed lest they cloud
The joke that never was on land or sea.

Then, wheezes of Bridgetta the untaught,
That new French cook before whom must have bowed Old Baal himself; of broad "a" battles fought
Between the lower and the higher browed;
Rum japes galore; teetotallers Here's how'd
By false friends' medicated treachery:
All must be scrutinized lest any crowd
The joke that never was on land or sea.

ENVOY.
What is that quip? Nay, I've grimaced and mowed
To have the long laugh on posterity:
Unto my selfish alone I've vowed
The joke that never was on land or sea.
—Stanley Kidder Wilson in New York Post.

Non-Fraternity Edict in Germany.
A conflict is developing between various students' fraternities and the socialist Prussian minister of education, Herr Haenisch. His plan to democratize universities is meeting with strong opposition from many of the students, a large number of whom are traditionally staunch supporters of monarchical, pan-German, and anti-Semitic principles. They acclaimed the advent of Dr. Wolfgang Kapp and the militaristic counter-revolution with enthusiasm. To nullify their influence in these matters, Herr Haenisch worked out a scheme under which equality of status was established between foreign students and German students. Fraternities were forbidden to engage in political and religious agitation, and a government representative was to sit on fraternity committees with authority to supervise their activities and report upon them. These measures are wrathfully denounced as oppressively reactionary by the student world of Germany, which is preparing to resist their imposition to the uttermost. Especially do they object to the proposal that foreign students at German universities should be placed on an equality with themselves. At the present time the German universities are said to be overrun with Polish and Russian students, and German youths do not relish the idea of having to fraternize with them on equal terms. Still more strongly do they resent having government representatives sent among them to act, they say, as "informers."

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Morse are being congratulated upon the birth of a daughter.

Early estimates from the Census Bureau are said to place the total rural population of the country at not more than 48 or 49 per cent. of the whole. The drift of population to the cities is the outstanding feature of ten years. The shade of Jefferson, looking at the growing urban population and the growing unrest, will perhaps permit itself an ironical, though kindly, smile. For it was Jefferson's belief that contentment was possible only if the inhabitants of a nation lived in the country and owned land. Jefferson hardly allowed in his thought for the "industrial revolution," as economists and historians call it, and he was not fond of cities. But time may yet prove that his view of this matter, as of so many others, was philosophically sound.

French Library Fund.

The benefit to be given under the auspices of the Ligue Nationale Francaise for the French Library fund, at the Alcazar next Monday night, is creating great interest.

Three special features will be presented in addition to the play of the evening, "39 East," which will receive its first Pacific Coast presentation at the Alcazar. Between the first and second acts Mons. André Ferrier of the Comédie Française and Mlle. Josephine Tapie will be seen in two charming scenes from Molière's "L'Ecole des Femmes." Mrs. Uda Waldrop, accompanied by her husband, will be heard in a group of delightful French songs, and during a third intermission Colonel George Cadwalader will tell the audience about the good done by the French Library and the necessity for giving it support.

Scotti Discovers a New Tenor.

Besides the tenor stars of the Metropolitan Opera House of first magnitude, Antonio Scotti brings to this city a young American tenor, whom he discovered singing in New York with a troupe called "The Argonne Players," who had fought and also sung and played in France for the amusement of their fellow-warriors. Mario Chamlee, of whom great things are prophesied by Mr. Scotti, Enrico Caruso, and other good judges, is an American despite his foreign name. Born in Los Angeles, his father was of English and his mother of French descent. The patonymic was originally Chalmodeley, pronounced in England Chumley and converted in this country into Chamlee.

When the war broke out he promptly volunteered and both fought and sang in France, joining the Argonne Players at the request of his commanding officer, and often singing to his comrades in hospitals and elsewhere under heavy shellfire. After the armistice the Argonne Players sang in Paris before the peace conference members, including President Wilson, Clemenceau, and Lloyd George, and Italian and French impresarios who heard him made Mario Chamlee flattering offers, including an engagement at the Opéra Comique. However, he returned to America and sang with the Argonne Players in New York, where he was heard by Mr. Scotti, who was so pleased with him that he offered to assist him in his musical education and took him on tour last autumn.

Mario Chamlee, who is barely twenty-seven, is a handsome, sturdy American boy, of happy disposition and much intelligence, who takes his present success and hopeful prospects modestly.

Tickets are on sale now at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s for the Scotti engagements.

Some time ago the Department of Agriculture was led by complaints from farmers to investigate the cause of the corrosion of wire fences. Experts concluded that the cause of the trouble was a metallurgical problem. The older iron wire is said to be more durable than the steel wire later introduced. The results of the tests made seem to indicate that manganese in the wire may have something to do with the corrosion. Manganese dissolved in iron up to a certain amount increases the electrical resistance, but if the manganese is not uniformly distributed electric currents may be generated in the wire when wet with rain, leading to corrosion by electrolysis. The deep pitting observed in corroded wire is said to be characteristic of electrolytic action.

It has been estimated that one Iceland waterfall could be made to yield 60,000 horsepower and another 50,000.

Memory Feats in Chinese Schools.

Chinese schoolroom methods are interesting as showing the contrast between schools in the Orient and schools in this country. Many elderly people will recall the time when practices in the district schools of the United States had some of the Chinese thoroughness and dependence upon the memory.

The beginner takes his hook to the teacher, who hears him read a column or more, after which the pupil returns to his desk and repeats this lesson aloud until he can recite it from memory. He then takes his hook again to the teacher, turns his back upon his master, and recites what he has learned. This is called "hacking the lesson."

In this way the pupil commits the whole book to memory, and he is expected to learn it so thoroughly that he can at any moment repeat the whole of any passage the initial words of which are mentioned to him.

Just before the noonday recess the teacher writes a sentiment, a proverb, or a proposition upon a slip of red paper and pastes it upon the door. Each boy as he goes out reads the lines, and in the afternoon renders to the teacher another line which will, with the first, make a couplet.

In China all honors, social, pecuniary, and official, await the scholar, and the teacher has always at hand illustrious examples to hold up for the emulation of those who become discouraged. Among the ancients, as among the moderns, many who were poor or stupid rose to eminence by sheer diligence and self-discipline.

The teacher tells of So Chin, who, being afflicted with drowsiness when at his nightly studies, thrust a needle through his flesh so that pain might keep him awake; and of the restless Sai Lin, whose active body revolted against sitting at his books, and who cured himself of a constant disposition to rise and leave them by placing a pail of cold water where his feet would be immersed in it whenever he stood up.

A warning is given in the career of the unscrupulous Pang Kien, who cut off the ends of straws that his teacher told him to arrange evenly, while the careful and honest Sung Pin separated a similar bundle and laid the straws straight, one by one, and found that they were all of uniform length without cutting. The character thus manifested by the two showed their teacher which of his pupils would best repay his efforts, and his judgment was justified by the event, for Pang Kien came to no good, while Sung Pin won renown and wealth, and great honor came through him to his preceptor.

YOUNG "REDS" IN NEW YORK.

The tendency of the juvenile to imitate his elders in some amazing fashion has taken a new turn. That surest index of home life, the youth of ten, is registering new symptoms, and they are not the customary histrionic sort. The hoy who once imitated Charlie Chaplin is now idealizing the soapboxer, and using the agitator's terminology and methods. He is also being encouraged in that direction by home influences.

That is the conclusions of the teachers at Public School 120, Manhattan, one of the city's institutions for delinquent hoys. When asked by a New York Tribune reporter if world unrest is in any way reflected in her charges the principal of the school replied:

"Never in my fifteen years with delinquent hoys have I had such difficulties as this year. Something entirely new has come over both pupils and parents. The hoys are imitating soapboxers and refusing in an unheard-of way to recognize authority. Their parents encourage such actions.

"I never had a boy soapboxer until this year. A short time ago, however, I received letters from two officers in Siberia. I read the letters to my hoys, asking if they wished to bring hooks and magazines to be sent to the soldiers in Siberia.

"The next day all the hoys brought an abundance of literature except a class of eighteen. From this number not a single hook or paper was forthcoming. I quietly investigated and found that the class had been harangued in soapbox fashion by a fifteen-year-old hoy of Russian-Jewish extraction.

"He had said to them in effect: 'American soldiers have no business in Siberia. If we leave them there without what they need they will throw down their arms and come home. Besides, the government ought to supply them with reading matter. If the government has no money to buy both magazines and bullets it has no right to ask them to fight.'

"We have always had hoys who were pick-pockets, gamblers, gangsters, or truants. But this year we have a new type—the hoy who thinks he has the right to do just as he pleases when he pleases. Refusal of these hoys to recognize authority has been unprecedented.

"The other day a teacher was explaining Longfellow's 'Psalm of Life.' After reading the passage about 'footprints on the sands of time' she went on to draw the moral that they themselves were now making footprints of character that would enable other people to judge what sort of men they were when they became older.

"A big Italian boy broke in upon her recital. Throwing his arm on the back of his seat, he said disgustedly: 'Oh, hell! What's the use? The good die young!'

"Another day a hoy got up in the middle of a lesson and left the school without permission. Later in the day a teacher found him at a 'movie' with a younger brother. He explained that he went home in order to take the child to the 'movies.'

"His mother defended him, asking beligerently, 'What difference does it make if he isn't in school?'

"That also is entirely new on the part of the parents of these hoys. Hitherto we have had either coöperation, or at least submission from the parents of incorrigibles. Now it is common for parents to deny that teachers have the right to forbid their children to do as they wish.

"This is responsible for many truants being listed with us as 'missing children' when their parents know their whereabouts all the time.

Table Talk

"We went to the aviation field last week. It was great sport."

"Yes, every time we met friends, Clarke insisted on taking an aeroplane trip with them."

"And Marion asked me how many times I had been up. I said 'six.' Then Marion said, 'Clarke, you come right home with me,' and I had to go."

"Clarke, have some more of this delicious coffee?"

Usually in a case like that the parents pretend to be prostrated with grief, but by visiting their homes when we are not expected we usually find the children."

As one possible explanation of the cause of this year's revolt against authority among her hoys this principal remarked that fully 60 per cent. of them are of Russian-Jewish extraction, and largely from homes where both parents are away all day working.

"What are you going to do about it?" she was asked.

"Get after the parents," was the grim reply. "Recognition of authority has got to start at home."

The Indianapolis News, replying to a correspondent, gives the following explanation of Indiana's nickname, the Hoosier state: In the early days of the state the people were called Hoosiers. There is a wide difference of opinion as to why they were called Hoosiers. Meredith Nicholson, in his book, "The Hoosiers," says in the course of an extended discussion of the origin of the word: "Both Governor Wright and O. H. Smith were of the opinion that 'Hoosier' was a corruption of 'Who's here' (yere or hyer)." It is also thought to be a corruption of hussar, and other explanations are advanced.

The editor of the Argonaut receives almost daily copies of newspapers, pamphlets, books, etc., from kind friends who have found therein something which they conceive to be of suggestive interest. Now and again more thoughtful correspondents mark the passages to which attention is desired. But in the greater number of instances the papers, pamphlets, and books come "as is," with no indication of the particular chapter or paragraph to which attention is sought to be directed. It would seem that the commonest intelligence would understand that the editor has neither time nor patience to plow through a hundred columns to discover something that somebody may wish to bring to his attention. In Mercy's name, good friends, when you send the editor a clipping, designate from what paper it is taken and of what date. And when newspapers or books are sent, mark the special pages or paragraphs to which attention is desired.

"Maine Went Hell Bent."

The Maine election on Monday of this week was contested upon national issues, and the result may fairly be accepted as a revelation of the public mind of a representative state. Not least significant is the fact that the new element in the electorate—the women, who for the first time have voted in Maine—largely, and indeed almost unanimously, gave their votes to the conservative cause. There has been a widely accredited belief that women are not prepared, either by interest in political affairs or by information, to vote intelligently. On the other hand, there are those who maintain that in recent years American women have been more diligent students of political—and of all other interests—than men. However this may be, the result in Maine would indicate that either the intelligent judgment or the conservative instinct of women has governed their action as voters. The result in Maine tends to confirm the judgment of political experts the country over that the tendency of the time is toward conservatism, and that in the public mind Senator Harding is more representative of the spirit of the country than Governor Cox. It is an old saying that "as Maine goes, so goes the Union." And this year there seems little doubt that the event will justify the tradition.

The news from Maine appears not so much to depress as to over-exhilarate Governor Cox. Indeed, something in the nature of brain-storm seems reflected in his speech to an Idaho audience on Tuesday, doubling his previous charge of a corrupt campaign fund in the Harding interest. He now advances his figures from fifteen to thirty millions. Next week, no doubt, he will have worked up to a sum even more imposing. Still he offers nothing in the way of proof—for the sufficient reason that there can be no proof of something non-existent.

The Presidential Office.

On another page we print a letter from Leonie Burr, not because it is sound in fact or logic, but under a policy of giving well-mannered opinion, whatever it may be, opportunity to air itself. First, it is not precisely true that both presidential candidates are "mediocrities." Neither may be a man of profound creative genius; profoundly let us hope not. Of creative genius, such as it has been, we have had more than enough in recent years. What the country now needs above all else is plain common sense in combination with experience in the affairs of government. Measured by these requirements, it is not just to tag either Mr. Harding or Mr. Cox as mediocre. Both have been long associated actively with public affairs and each in his own sphere has won a distinct measure of public approval. The reproach of mediocrity may not fairly be applied to men who under the tests of high public mandate and of public trust prove themselves both diligent and capable. If the business of the presidential office were such as to call for constructive genius of a high type, then not unreasonably both Harding and Cox might be criticized as mediocrities. But the case is not of that sort; and, we repeat, that under the requirements either of the candidates measures fairly up to the job.

It is to be remembered that the presidency is a representative office. A man who in character, spirit, vision, and aims is a composite of the character, spirit, vision, and aims of the people of the United States is likely to make a better President than one whose soaring ambition seeks to reconstruct the world. The world has a way of reconstructing itself, and each era does the job pretty much in its own image. A man of independent mind and of reckless spirit in the presidency, possessed of advanced ideas either sound or theoretical, would be a ruler as distinct from a President. Under our system a ruler is out of place. What we need—and surely what we want—is a man who will faithfully execute the laws as he finds them and discreetly conduct such affairs as fall to the determination of the executive office in the spirit of the era in which we live and in response to our obligations to the world as it exists. Our system does not contemplate a ruler—in other words, a king—but rather an executive of honest mind and of sound judgment in practical affairs. It is no accident that our Presidents, for the most part, have been drawn from the plain people, the type to which both Harding and Cox belong. Ours is a plain people's government; ours is a plain people's country. The presidency of the United States is not for Cæsars and Napoleons, still less for theorists and dreamers. Let us thankfully accept the type of man who will attend to the business of the country diligently and honestly, and give glory to God that we are done, for a while at least, with autocratic visionaries.

It would, we fancy, be difficult for Leonie Burr—or anybody else, for that matter—to demonstrate that one candidate has accomplished more in the governorship of Ohio than the other has in the Senate of the United States. The opportunities and obligations of the two offices are wholly different and there is no common denominator by which the achievements of the two men may be measured. It would seem quite sufficient that each has so conducted himself in office as to have satisfied his constituents and to have found special favor with the party of his affiliation.

The hope of our correspondent that the wheel of time shall bring into "the highest place of our land" * * * men whose burning desire will be the ever greater and greater advancement of the ethical ideals of our beloved country" is one in which the Argonaut must confess its inability to share. We have had a recent example of "burning desire" for the advancement of "ethical ideals," and the result has not been edifying. Our incumbent—and more or less respected—President abandoned his duties at home under a "burning desire" to reconstruct the world. And what came of it? The answer is in plain view. It has given us a disordered political life; it has put incompetence and extravagance in high places; it has burdened the country with a mountain of debt in large part unnecessary; it has so increased the cost of living that those once well to do are now in distress; it has set class against class and enthroned social discontent. Worse than all this, as relating to the welfare of the race at large, it has raised in millions of minds utopian hopes impossible of fulfillment, and has sown broadcast seeds that are sprouting in social turbulence throughout the world. Reverently, let us pray, that we may be spared in the "highest places of our land" men whose "burning desire" is "for ideals" as distinct from practicalities.

It may be true that Dr. Jastrow, Professor Kellogg, Professor Garner, and other bookish men are satisfied that the league of nations is functioning. So it is in a way. But, it is pertinent to ask, to what practical purpose? Is it making peace in the world? Is it bringing prosperity or content to the peoples of the world? Is it in any measure or degree doing that which it was theoretically planned to do? It is not necessary to answer these questions—they are answered by conditions and events as they are spread before the world. Before the league of nations can be made a practically beneficent or a practically workable force it will have to be rewritten, less in the spirit of burning desire for ethical ideals than of respect for a world, not as we would like to have it, but for a world as it is.

Harding's Pledges to the California Delegation.

Senator Harding's reply to the greeting of a delegation from California on Tuesday was made in the spirit of candor that has characterized his various talks since nomination. Speaking broadly he said, "We mean to return to constitutional government, to restore coordinated activity and congressional responsibility." There will be no "trespass of the Executive on the constitutional rights of Congress, there will be no surrender to Congress of the constitutional powers of the Executive." These pledges are made with evident sincerity. They coincide with and reinforce the statement of Mr. Coolidge, the vice-presidential candidate, at Boston on August 28th, namely, that the "dominant note of the campaign" is the overwhelming demand of the American people for a return to the original intent of the can people for such change in government as will restore constitutionalism in the place of arbitrary dictatorship.

Speaking directly to points suggested by his visitors, Senator Harding dealt plainly, yet temperately, with the issue of Japanese immigration. Without violating any consideration of propriety, and without offense to Japanese sensibilities, Senator Harding would solve the question of Japanese immigration by "coöperative understandings" so faithfully observed that "evasions of agreements by individual Japanese shall be completely stopped." In brief, Senator Harding is for maintaining the integrity of American civilization by restrictions that will reserve our soil and our industry to the race by which this country has been occupied and to which it belongs.

With reference to the tariff policy as it relates to the country at large, and particularly to California, Senator Harding declared himself in full accord with our traditional policy of protection. Whenever the life of our own production is threatened by external competition, Senator Harding pledges full and adequate protection. That there is an increasing menace to our production by countries that can produce with cheaper labor than our own is frankly admitted; and as frankly the senator declares that the obligation is upon the government to stand between the products of American labor and the products of cheaper alien labor.

Is there anybody in California to resent or to minimize the importance of these pledges? Let us hope not.

A High-Handed Procedure.

The current wholesale price of fuel oil at points on San Francisco Bay is $2.35 per barrel. This is the price paid by consumers, including railroad companies, the shipping interests, and industrial institutions in general. It is a price established by the balance of supply and demand. Of course consumers would like to fill their reservoirs at lower rates—that is only natural, since the buyer is always a bear. Nevertheless there is no criticism of the rate as extortionate, and no protest on the part of any ordinary consumer.

By some means, known only to itself, the Navy Department assumes that the current price of oil should be, not the commercial rate of $2.35 per barrel, but a lesser rate of $2 per barrel. And upon this assumption it demands that its requirements shall be provided for at the lesser price. It demands oil for the purposes of the navy at $2 per barrel. After much protesting and much dickering the Shell Oil Company, whose reservoirs are at Martinez, has refused to deal with the Navy Department upon the terms of its own dictation. It is willing to supply oil for navy use at the current rate, but declines to make the navy a preferred customer at a cut rate.

On Saturday last an officer of the navy, acting under orders from the department, appeared at the works of the Shell Company at Martinez and demanded 2000 barrels of oil at the price arbitrarily fixed by the department—$2 per barrel. The requisition was refused, whereupon a detachment of marines, directed by the officer in charge, proceeded by force to take what was wanted. Locks were broken, doors battered down, and the works of the Shell Company otherwise violated and damaged. No effort was made, other than by verbal protest, to prevent the seizure.

The mandate under which this high-handed proceeding was carried out is the Lever Act of three years ago, a law enacted in promotion of governmental efficiency in the then pending war. It is part of the system of war legislation which came into existence under the then pending emergency, and it was necessary—or deemed to be necessary—to enable the government to meet its urgent responsibilities. Although the actual business of war ceased more than twenty-two months ago—although, in fact, the war ended in November in 1918—the United States is still technically at war with Germany. It is a stupid fiction stubbornly maintained, but the technical fact remains. And now, with the war long past, at a time when there is no emergency, an extraordinary "war power" is employed by the Navy Department in the seizure of property which might be bought at current prices which the department declines to pay.

Over and above the authority of the Navy Department, over and above the authority prescribed in the Lever Act, is the Constitution of the United States, which declares that private property may not be taken for public use except upon reasonable payment therefor; and by all the rules of business and common sense, reasonable payment means price current in open market. Now if the Navy Department may break down doors and pick locks to supply itself with oil at rates less than its market value, there is no reason why it may not do the same in supplying itself with flour, potatoes, or whatnot that it may require. If the Constitution may not be invoked in protection of property in oil, where is the logic that protects other commodities? And what becomes of the authority of the Constitution itself if a department of the government may, at its will and pleasure, nullify it by arbitrary action? These questions may not be answered without convicting the Navy Department of a very gross outrage.

The Argonaut holds no brief for the Shell Oil Company. It has no relations or community of interest with that purely business organization. In declaring that an outrage has been perpetrated against the Shell Oil Company it does nothing more than perform a public duty in protesting against that which the Constitution of the United States emphatically and in express terms prohibits.

"Confident Expectations" Gone Wrong.

Mr. McAdoo's retirement from the office of Secretary of the Treasury was marked by a statement that he "confidently expected" emergency financing for governmental needs to end shortly. In November last the then Secretary of the Treasury Glass repeated this assurance, and fixed the time when the issuance of treasury certificates would cease at June 30, 1920. His only qualifications were that the tax levies would remain on the same high level and that economy would be practiced. The tax levies have remained, but they have produced more revenue than in the preceding year, likewise more than was expected. Economy has been practiced to the extent of cutting down by Congress of departmental appropriations by approximately a billion dollars.

None the less the end of emergency financing is not yet. On August 27th there were outstanding treasury certificates to the amount of $2,571,000,000. In that month Secretary Houston found it necessary to issue $150,000,000 more treasury certificates, paying an extraordinary interest rate of 6 per cent., although the certificates are tax free up to $5000. The Secretary now finds it necessary to issue $400,000,000 additional certificates that are coming due in the current month. And in October he proposes to pay for one series of these certificates, maturing March 15th next and drawing interest at 5 3/4 per cent., and for another series, maturing September 15, 1921, interest at 6 per cent. Of course, $650,000,000 is less than $800,000,000; none the less it is manifest that the "confident expectation" of no further issue of treasury certificates after June 30, 1920, as promised by Secretary McAdoo and definitely reiterated by Secretary Glass, has not been realized.

Furthermore, Secretary Houston declares that in consequence of the $800,000,000 worth of certificates coming due in September and October there will have, very shortly, to be a new issue of certificates. Still he is hopeful. "Further issues of treasury certificates during the months of October and November may subsequently result in temporary increases in both gross debt and floating debt," he says, "but the treasury confidently expects that by the completion of the second quarter of the fiscal year, on December 31, 1920, any such temporary increases will have been overcome, and that the gross debt and floating debt on December 31st will have been reduced below the amounts outstanding on September 30th." It will be observed that "confident expectation" is again deferred to date.

There was a net current deficit for the first two months of the present fiscal year—July and August—of $125,305,710.63. "This net current deficit," says Secretary Houston, "is due chiefly to actual cash payments in the amount of some $130,000,000, made necessary by the provisions of the Transportation Act of 1920, in connection with the return of the railroads to private control. According to latest estimates, payments on account of the railroads will probably continue on a large scale during the balance of the present calendar year, and will be relatively heavy during the month of September."

It would appear that in voicing "confident expectations" both Secretaries McAdoo and Glass overlooked the little item of the government's obligations to the railroads—obligations growing out of a policy that was as unnecessary and as extravagantly carried out as it has been demoralizing. It was, no doubt, a mere lapse, but a lapse that makes thoughtful citizens fear the outlook of some other little item or items running into the tens of millions or maybe hundreds of millions. Very obviously, our national finances are being operated in a haphazard and hand-to-mouth fashion.

Executive Nullification.

Section 34 of the Merchant Marine Act, approved June 5th by President Wilson, reads as follows:

That in the judgment of Congress articles or provisions in treaties or conventions to which the United States is a party, which restrict the right of the United States to impose discriminatory customs duties on imports entering the United States in foreign vessels and in vessels of the United States, and which also restrict the right of the United States to impose discriminatory tonnage dues on foreign vessels and on vessels of the United States should be terminated, and the President is hereby authorized and directed within ninety days after this act becomes law to give notice to the several governments, respectively, parties to such treaties or conventions, that so much thereof as imposes any such restriction on the United States will terminate on the expiration of such periods as may be required for the giving of such notice by the provisions of such treaties or conventions.

The ninety days prescribed in the law above quoted has lapsed, but nothing, so far as can be learned at the Department of State, has been done. It is reported that the matter is on the desk of the President for action. In the meantime it has been made manifest to inquirers that the State Department is not in sympathy with Section 34. The department finds objections to the policy of eliminating from treaties of commerce and navigation the provisions that prevent this government from returning to the plan of discriminatory duties under which the American merchant marine first attained its growth. Officials of the department intimate that such a policy will produce trade wars—as if trade wars were not already being waged wherever there is competition in trade. And in this view the State Department is in entire harmony with the ideas of other powers that have merchant fleets of their own.

For example, we are informed by press dispatches that Norway is about to file a protest against discriminatory provisions of our Merchant Marine Act. Norway's objection is founded in the fact that a policy based upon this act will operate to the disadvantage of Norwegian ships now engaged in trading between West Indian and American ports. Observe that this trade is not directly between Norway and the United States; it is trade between countries alien to Norway, one of which is the United States. The Norwegian maritime laws differ widely from American maritime laws—so widely as to permit cheaper operation of ships. And with this advantage Norwegian ship-owners find it practicable to compete successfully in trade remote from Norway—in the immediate instance a trade that naturally is American trade. Because we take steps to protect our own, Norway protests—and finds sympathetic bearing in the American Department of State.

But these considerations aside, the outstanding fact is that the executive department of our government declines to enforce a law enacted by Congress. Thus the executive department arrogates to itself authority to set aside a statute, one to which the executive approval was given so recently as last June. The special case is illustrative of an executive disposition manifest in many things. Now and again in our history administrations have more or less paltered with established laws, but never until now has there been such general and absolute contempt of the authority of Congress as declared in definitely enacted laws. Truly this has become a one-man government, and, as truly, a time has come when usurpation must be rebuked if we are to preserve our system in its integrity.

A Notable Achievement in Statecraft.

Those who have been in the habit of sneering at Governor Stephens as a "dodo" may well modify their views in respect of what the worthy governor has achieved in the movement to bar Japanese immigration. Without anything in the way of sensationalism, either in word or in act, and without giving offense to the Japanese government, he has done more to bring this important matter to the attention of the country and enforce action with respect to it where it will count than all the self-seeking politicians have been able to do in two years of irritating agitation. Particularly, he has taken from Senator Phelan the most effective of his campaign issues.

Governor Stephens' manner in dealing with this subject has been intelligent and judicious. First he gathered authoritatively and put into brief and understandable form facts that go to illustrate the danger of mixing up a non-assimilable element with our own people. Then quietly but emphatically and persistently he has put the facts and the argument, to the end of definite conviction, before those competent to employ them effectively. With marked tact he has nullified the Japanese question as a party issue by making it an issue of patriotism as appealing to one political party as to another. In brief, Governor Stephens has done the country a great service by making it plain that it is a duty of the government, no matter which party may be in immediate control, to protect the United States against another problem comparable with that of the negro problem.

And in all this Governor Stephens has illustrated the practical value of common sense and plain honesty, as against personal and demagogic politics. Senator Phelan would have messed up the whole matter by making it a personal campaign issue, and the cause would have been dependent in an immediate sense upon his individual political fortunes. Governor Stephens has so withdrawn it from the zone of partisan interests that it will now be carried through, no matter who may be elected or who may fail of election. Well done!

Governor Cox's Charge.

Governor Cox has declared, and persists in declaring, that there is in project a scheme to "buy the presidency" for Senator Harding by use of a vast corruption fund of fifteen millions of dollars. He has declared that he has proofs in support of this charge. But he has failed to the extent of eight million dollars, or half his original statement, to produce them. An investigating committee of the Senate has called before it many persons of presumptive knowledge, including the chairmen of both the Republican and the Democratic national committees. Chairman Hays has refuted the charge with the statement that campaign funds so far pledged to the Republican committee aggregate approximately $3,000,000 and that the utmost expectancy is an aggregate of approximately $4,000,000. Chairman White of the Democratic committee has denied knowledge of any fund greater than that suggested by Mr. Hays. Thus, so far as proofs of Governor Cox's charge are concerned, after a period of more than twenty days since the allegations were made, none have been forthcoming.

Governor Cox has not ventured to suggest further than in the most general way that any improper use has been made, or is in the way of being made, of funds in the Republican campaign. And here is the real issue. It matters little what amount of money may be put into a campaign, if nothing shall be put in corruptly or illegitimately. There never was, and there never will be, a political campaign—or any species of rivalry in or out of politics—that does not seek all the resources legitimately possible of attainment. It is not the amount of a campaign fund, but the use of it, that is important. If the Republican party, or any other party, is using money or planning to use money in corrupt or illegitimate ways, then the country is entitled to know it, and the organization in whose behalf wrong methods are practiced deserves, and surely will encounter, defeat at the polls. The American people will not consent that anybody shall "buy the presidency." Nor will the American people consent that any candidate shall make loose charges of corruption and fail to support them by proofs without suffering the penalties which properly attach to falsehood and slander.

Large quantities of paper suits made in Germany are being displayed by a British firm of importers at their shop in London. These garments are cut in English styles and are said to be of the best class of paper texture. They can be bought in lots of a thousand for a little over 58 cents each. In one month the British importer took 40,000 of these suits, a large number being reexported to India and South Africa. The agents who are dealing in these suits say that, by buying under the present rate of exchange, it is possible for a man to purchase a new suit once a week and that over a period of twelve months the entire cost would be less than the price of a single woolen suit.

Japan has made a large sugar exportation to the United States and Canada.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

"A Worthy Cause" and Other Matters.

LOS ANGELES, September 9, 1920.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Your leader, "Prohibition as It Works Out," is edifying. The passage of the Volstead Act, over the veto of the Chief Executive and in spite of his warnings of the dangers involved, is called "a small matter" by some people. The odious tax on tea and the seizure of John Hancock's cargo of wine from Madeira seemed a small matter to the myopic torments of a former period.

"Beat a drum and blow a fife and you can put over anything on the fool public" was the theory of one great political manipulator. But the American public—unlike a worm—stings when it finally turns on its tormentors. One political party, backed by the pecuniary aristocracy of this country, was crushed because it dared to impose alien and sedition laws on a free people in 1798. "Gag-laws" and prohibitions have never functioned well on this side of the Atlantic.

Sound California and French wines have been as important a part of the menu of millions of honest Americans as soup or meat. Great numbers of worthy Americans were abroad when many self-exempted politicians at home were stealthily filling their cellars with fiery booze and loudly mouthing in favor of "Prohibition" to be applied to the "lower classes," who "do not know when to take it and when to leave it alone."

Returning from overseas, independent thinking Americans are sometimes sickened at the spectacle of pecksniffian hypocrisy which has taken the place of a spontaneous and commendable war spirit. The harlequinade of prohibition is amusing enough, but the abrupt denial of what had been thought to be an inalienable right to personal liberty in the choice of food and drink seems ugly and sinister.

How can a dissenting American register his disapproval most effectively? None but a calm-eyed bovine will trot along with the herd meekly. One American is obeying the odious prohibition law to the letter and is doggedly drinking lemon-juice in self-punishment for his share in the general apathy and lethargy of the past.

A practical, personal way to "get even" is to eschew all "ready-made" substitute beverages, both hard and soft. The makers and vendors of these sloppy concoctions are thought to be responsible in part for the advent of prohibition. They may be declared "black," according to the Australian method of tagging the bad ones. It is but a short step to partial boycott of the entire tribe of criminal profiteers which the war has raised from the dregs of the social caldron. These pescicane (dog-fish) as the Italians call them, swimming around with their greedy mouths stretched wide open, can be beaten to death if every person will begin at once to buy only those commodities and materials which are vitally necessary, and will rigidly guard the savings for use in a high and worthy cause.

The "worthy cause" of the hour might appear to be the restoration of the French area laid waste by the slinking, retreating Hun. In June, four billion francs of French Credit National 5 per cent. bonds were snapped up at 485 (par 500) by the thrifty French people. None of these bonds were offered outside of France. They can now be bought in the Paris market at about 490 to yield nearly 15 per cent. to those who exchange dollars for francs now. Valuable premiums are given eight times a year. The bonds mature in 1995, optional 1940. They can be purchased through any reputable banker or broker in the U. S. A. They are veritable liberty bonds par excellence, because so long as the French army stands as a solid wall against progress westward of Hunnish and Slavic culture we shall not need to worry much. We have made ourselves secure from invasion, but for all time to come France will have to stand guard against the treacherous Hun next door and the Hun-made Bolshevis beyond. It is a good investment, as well as a high purpose, to continue to aid the French, this year and forever.

Furthermore, all personal savings withheld from arrogant, purse-proud profiteers will help to break up the "corners" in various commodities, bring the prices down, and hasten the return to the pre-war norm. And still furthermore, entre nous, pianissimo, these invested savings overseas can be used year after year by joyful American tourists in France to buy such harmless items as "Clos de Vougeot, 1911 vintage," at about a dollar a bottle, and exquisite vintage champagnes, which were intended for select American trade, but which remain in France for the delectation of connoisseurs.

By drinking lemon-juice rigidly for eight or ten months of the year a superb healthy taste for the rare vintages of the earth can be cultivated. In Paris, in spite of so many years of turmoil and pescicane extravagances, there is to be had, if one knows the way, the unparalleled cuisine which goes so well with the incomparable old wines, and the exquisite sense that a "busy American" has learned perfectly how to passer le temp even if only for a short vacation period.

Less Sound Than Suggestive.

SAN FRANCISCO, September 12, 1920.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I have lately read and heard a number of discussions by serious thinkers on the relative merits of both our candidates for the presidency; and the consensus of opinion seems to be almost unanimous in proclaiming the mediocrity of both Harding and Cox. Harding's achievements in the Senate have been anything but brilliant. I take it that he possesses neither the courage nor the aptitude for bold and individual thinking, and should he be elected in November our government would be run on the plans of a syndicate. But what seems most sinister to the honor of our country is his announcement that he and the Senate will make a separate peace with Germany, thus not only deserting our allies in the late war, but contributing to the arrogance of the Germans and in their repudiation of the treaty.

The World's Work in its last issue makes the declaration that for cogent reasons the framers of our Constitution denied the right of the Senate to make peace, although it might and should declare war, and should the contingency arise in which the Senate shall be called upon by Harding to conclude a separate peace with Germany the matter will be immediately taken to the highest court in the land, because of the illegality of the procedure.

On the other hand should Cox, who, by the way, seems to have accomplished more as governor of his state than Harding as senator of these United States, should Cox, I say, become our chief executive, then it seems in all probability that present conditions will continue to prevail. And what about our duty to China and the injustice perpetrated at Versailles when Japan was given a free hand in Shantung?

It is indeed tragic, when civilization itself is in the balance, that both our great parties should have submitted to the machinations of selfish and unpatriotic politicians in the election of candidates who do not truly represent our great country. Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur has stated in one of his lectures that the individual advances very much more rapidly than the state, that we are not adepts at reconstruction, that the reason we were able to accomplish so much during the war was because our most brilliant men joined the forces of our government but retired to private life immediately upon the signing of the armistice and left the intricate problems of our government to be solved by mediocre politicians. We are a patient nation, but it will nevertheless not be long before we will demand that the state advance with the same leaps and bounds as the individual and we shall then have, not self-seeking politicians in the highest places of our land, but men whose burning desire will be the ever greater and greater advancement of the ethical ideals of our beloved country.

I have heard some of our most learned men—Drs. Jastrow, Kellogg, Garner—discuss the league of nations, and all are agreed that civilization will rest on a firmer basis when this instrument functions properly. Is it not due to the attitude of the United States that the league has not accomplished all that it might accomplish? Dr. Garner informed us that it is functioning at the present time.

LEONIE BURR.

DEFENDING THE PRESIDENT.

It may be we are all tired of the peace conference. Indeed there is no element of doubt in the matter. We are not only tired of it; we are sick of it, disgusted with it, nauseated with it. But we can not get rid of it. We must carry it on our backs like the old man of the sea. It is the dominant issue in the presidential campaign. It lies like a pestilence upon the face of the world. Its shadow, prophetic of mischief, has been cast prophetically across the future pages of history. And we shall be fortunate if we are not making a similar plaint fifty years hence.

In the innocence of our hearts we supposed that we now knew all about the conference, that we had lifted the curtain, peered into the dark corners, searched the closets. It may be that we have not even begun to do any of these things. At least we have done them only in a preliminary and perfunctory way. Dr. Dillon helped us, perhaps, more than any other writer, but then Dr. Dillon, able and honest and abundantly informed as he is, was naturally writing from the British point of view and mainly for a British audience. Until now we have had nothing comparable with his work from the standpoint of the American observer. There were American reporters, rather too many of them, but with few exceptions they were just reporters and nothing more. They did not interpret. They had no background of familiarity with European politics from which to work. And sometimes they were emotionally partisan.

But now comes Mr. Patrick Gallagher of the New York Herald with one of the three or four worthwhile books about the doings at Versailles. He calls it "America's Aims and Asia's Aspirations." It is directed particularly to the Asiatic results of the conference and to the Asiatic attitude that has been induced by the conference. Mr. Gallagher may be said to have Asiatic sympathies—more power to him. He wants to tell the world how Asia was treated, and what Asia may possibly do as a result. But Mr. Gallagher takes no narrow view. If he thinks sectionally, so to speak, he does not forget that his topic is part of the whole. Whatever was done at the conference was done by a few men, and it was the outcome of a general situation and of the play and interplay of apparently irrelevant forces. And so Mr. Gallagher describes for us the conference as a whole, the tangle and conflict of interests that pervaded it, the jugglery of the policies that confused the issue, and the personal peculiarities of some of the chief actors that played so large a part in the conclusions. And perhaps it may be said that his book has another value. Mr. Gallagher is an admirer of President Wilson and he says for him everything that an honest ingenuity can say. Here we have, not the special plea, but the just plea. It is the best that a hearty admiration can make. There was once a man, says Mr. Gallagher, who amassed so much power that he announced his partnership with God, but he did not consult God about this. So God raised up one who looked like Michael in order that the usurper might be humbled, but Michael, too, became drunk with power, so God took away the power from him, that all men might know themselves as clay and Him only as God. Emperor and President!

It is with the composition of the American delegation that Mr. Gallagher first finds fault. It was actually from this that our "woes unnumbered" sprang. What did these men know about Pacific problems? What could they know? Not one among them had a grain of Western information or opinion. With the exception of General Bliss, whose duties were military, "their entire knowledge of the fundamental facts of Far Eastern problems could have been compressed into a very small pill-box. Messrs. Wilson, Lansing, and House did not know even the rudiments of the issues." Mr. Gallagher returns to this point again and again. The American delegates were outmatched at every point, outmatched in skill, in intelligence, and in knowledge. The President had deliberately surrounded himself with nonentities on the principle that "among the blind the one-eyed man is king." And now he had to pay the penalty. His hand contained no trumps, no picture cards to play against the strong hands of his adversaries. It was all so pitiful, so unnecessary, much better it would have been to have taken c of Lodge, of Knox, or Roosevelt! They, at least, were Americans. They might have understood. What a pity it was he permitted himself to go to Paris at all! . . . It was courting disaster to leave the American end of the peace during the most vital month of all in the feeble hands of Lansing and the hollow head of House." England and France, says Mr. Gallagher, mobilized their brains. Mr. Balfour was England's ace, and her pack was full of face cards. We had "one ace and four deuces." It might have been otherwise "if only Mr. Wilson had not been obsessed by the delusion that he carried in his own head all the wisdom of America. There was work in Paris for Mr. Root, Mr. Taft, Dr. David Jayne Hill, and Mr. Lodge. Mr. Wilson did not realize that fact, and that settled it, him, and us."

Mr. Gallagher is of Irish blood and he naturally emphasizes the relation of Ireland to the conference. He says truly that all peoples have the right of revolution against tyranny, but the attitude of other governments toward such a revolution must be closely safeguarded. Mr. Wilson, he says, has beamed upon some revolutions and frowned upon others. There were two courses open to us as a government in approaching the Irish question at Versailles. If Mr. Wilson wished to sustain the Irish rebels it was his duty to notify the British to that effect before going to Paris. Did he do this? Of course he did not. Tricks, says Mr. Gallagher, are inadmissible. "To run with the hare and to hunt with the hounds is repugnant to American as well as to British nature. Why, then, did Mr. Wilson attempt to run with the Sinn Fein hare and to hunt with the British hounds? That was what he did, both personally and through the nimble assistance of Colonel House. He sought to play with Mr. O'Kelly and with Mr. Walsh on the one hand, and with Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Balfour on the other. . . . I had numerous talks with Messrs. O'Kelly, Walsh, and the other Irish spokesmen, as well as with British officials, and I must confess that both the Irish and the English are amply justified in charging Mr. Wilson with having acted in bad faith and in exceedingly bad taste. . . . The English at no time attempted to walk upstairs and downstairs at one and the same moment. They left such feats, impossible of performance, to Mr. Wilson." And yet Mr. Gallagher is an enthusiastic admirer of President Wilson. He looks upon him as a sort of Prometheus, a Titan, chained to the rocks. And he is placing upon his actions the best interpretation that those actions will permit. But the President's political gymnastics brought their own reward. Lloyd George was quick to see the advantage of allowing Mr. Wilson to meddle with British domestic affairs. For having meddled in one direction to England's detriment it was easy to persuade him, indeed to force him, to meddle in other directions to England's advantage. This, indeed, is actually what happened, and in more than one instance

The story of the transfer of power from the conference as a whole to the Big Four has never before been told, but it has been told now by Mr. Gallagher. When Mr. Wilson returned to America during the course of the conference he was fully resolved that the league of nations should form a part of the peace treaty. He had paid a high price for his triumph. He had dropped the Freedom of the Seas and he had surrendered to Mr. Hughes of Australia on the subject of racial equality for the Japanese. What was his anger when he returned to Paris to find that the precious league had been put in a drawer at the instigation of Mr. Balfour and that Mr. Lansing had actually delivered a speech in Paris in support of an "immediate peace," that is to say, peace without the league. At once there was an explosion. No one knows quite what went on in the President's room at the Hotel Crillon. The great men came and went, but there were no sounds of the conflagration that was certainly raging. But the President had his way, or thought he had, although as usual he had to pay a far heavier price for his triumph than it was worth. Lloyd George and Balfour knew well that Mr. Wilson could have his way in all things so long as he was able to appeal for the votes of the small nationalities who had been mesmerized by "self-determination" and all the other contents of the idealist's trick bag. At once Lloyd George began to harp on the idea of "getting along" with a few men "who could talk and understand English." Mr. Wilson walked straight into the net. He seems even to have believed that the proposal came from him, but, says Mr. Gallagher, "Mr. Wilson committed hari-kari when he created the Council of Four. . . . He did what M. Clemenceau and Mr. Balfour wanted him to do." Mr. Wilson was now confronted with three men who knew precisely what they wanted and who were utterly unmoved by the claptrap of the Wilsonian idealism. No eloquence on earth could move them by a hair's breadth. Emotionalism formed no part of their stock in trade.

We have often been told that the Monroe Doctrine is fully protected by the present terms of the league of nations. As a matter of fact it is in no way protected. Or, more, we find Mr. Wilson outwitted and outmaneuvered. It will be remembered that an overwhelming public opinion compelled the insertion of a Monroe Doctrine clause, although Mr. Wilson himself saw no reason for such a safeguard in a world that would henceforth be ruled by the amities and the concords, for had he not so ordained it? Now it seems that when Mr. Wilson returned to Paris he confided the difficulty to Lord Robert Cecil, who immediately "posed his patrician personality in an attitude of deep sympathy." Lord Robert said that he personally would at once attend to the matter, and therewith he drafted the following clause: "Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe Doctrine for securing maintenance of peace." Now to the casual eye that appears to be quite satisfactory. But is it? Does it protect the Monroe Doctrine? Not in the least. The clause has no meaning whatever so far as the Monroe Doctrine is concerned. The Monroe Doctrine was intended to prevent the extension of European absolutist principles to South America and to forbid the interference of Europe in American affairs. In other words it regulates the relations of Europe and America. But the league is a world organization in which America herself was to participate. An interference in American affairs by the league would not be an interference by Europe, and it is only against interferences by Europe that the Monroe Doctrine operates. In other words the supposedly protective clause is a "scrap of paper," and it would be so treated in the event of its invocation. And so we may thank Mr. Gallagher for telling us that Lord Curzon wrote the Monroe Doctrine clause, that Lord Robert Cecil trimmed it, that Mr. Balfour inserted an important word, and that Mr. Wilson O. K.'d it.

It is not possible here to do more than skim a little of the cream from Mr. Gallagher's book, which is published by the Century Company. It is one of the really important books of the day. SIDNEY CORYN.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Paul Ivory Perkins, seven years old, is "packing 'em in" at his evangelistic meetings in Kansas City. Young Perkins, who is called the youngest religion dispenser, is said to be threatening Billy Sunday's attendance records.

Amy Lowell has recently received her first scholastic degree. Baylor University, Texas, celebrated its diamond anniversary by conferring its Lit. D. upon Miss Lowell—along with Harriet Monroe, Edwin Markham, and Vachel Lindsay.

John Dolacinski, thirteen years old, arrived in Detroit to become an American after service of two years with the Polish army. John has an honorable discharge from General Haller's army and a wound stripe. He says he wasn't the youngest soldier in the army either.

Herbert Johnson is in Paris, looking over the operatic star field. For the first time in history a typical American from American-born parents is out and out director of one of our great American opera-producing organizations. When Campanini was director of the Chicago Opera Association Herbert Johnson was its business manager. After the death of the maestro he became full director.

Hana Shimozumi, the young Japanese prima donna of the Royal English Opera Company, has a wonderful command of the English language, her enunciation and pronunciation being superior to many of the American and English-born artists. All overlook the fact that Miss Shimozumi has spent twenty of her twenty-three years in this country, having left the land of the cherry blossoms while a child of three. Miss Shimozumi received her musical education in San Francisco and her literary training at the University of California, Berkeley, California.

Dr. Blanche Norton of Eldon, Iowa, is the first woman to be decorated with the Order of King George I by a King of Greece. Miss Norton has just received the decoration from King Alexander. As a physician with the American Committee for Relief in the Near East, Dr. Norton did great service, it is said, at Kerasseude, Anatolia, by treating the trachomatous eyes of Greek orphans. After a long period of service she contracted the disease herself and is now being treated at Constantinople. Dr. Norton, who is a graduate of Cornell Medical College, was an examining physician on the staff of the Charities Aid Association of New York and the Bureau of Charities of Chicago before going into war relief work.

Jan Masaryk, diplomatic representative of the new Republic of Czechoslovakia, is a Czechoslovak to the manner born and bred, being the son of that country's most distinguished living citizen. He is almost an American, too. His mother is of 100 per cent. American nativity, and all members of his family, including his father, who is president of Czechoslovakia, and his sister, Dr. Alice Masaryk, head of the Czechoslovak Red Cross, have spent much time in this country. He himself lived here for many years before establishing his country's legation in Washington about a year ago. He has had much experience in American business and industry. He speaks many languages, as do most educated Czechs, and his English is particularly good.

OLD FAVORITES.

The Passionate Shepherd to His Love.

Come live with me and he my love,
And we will all the pleasures prove,
That valleys, groves, and hills and fields,
Woods or steepy mountains yield.

And we will sit upon the rocks,
Seeing the shepherds feed their flocks,
By shallow rivers, to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

And I will make thee beds of roses,
And a thousand fragrant posies;
A cap of flowers and a kirtle
Embroidered all with leaves of myrtle:

A gown made of the finest wool,
Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
Fair lined slippers for the cold,
With huckles of the purest gold:

A belt of straw and ivy buds,
With coral clasps and amber studs;
And if these pleasures may thee move,
Come live with me, and he my love.

The shepherd swains shall dance and sing,
For thy delight, each May morning:
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me, and he my love.
—Christopher Marlowe.

Sound the Loud Timbrel.

Sound the loud Timbrel o'er Egypt's dark sea;
Jehovah has triumph'd—his people are free!
Sing—for the pride of the Tyrant is broken,
His chariots, his horsemen, all splendid and brave—
How vain was their boast, for the Lord hath but spoken,
And chariots and horsemen are sunk in the wave.
Sound the loud Timbrel o'er Egypt's dark sea;
Jehovah has triumph'd—his people are free!

Praise to the Conqueror, praise to the Lord!
His word was our arrow, his breath was our sword—
Who shall return to tell Egypt the story
Of those she sent forth in the hour of her pride?
For the Lord hath look'd out from his pillar of glory,
And all her brave thousands are dashed in the tide.
Sound the loud Timbrel o'er Egypt's dark sea;
Jehovah has triumph'd—his people are free!
—Thomas Moore.

The Arah's Farewell to His Steed.

My beautiful, my beautiful, that standest meekly by
With thy proudly arched and glossy neck, and dark and fiery eye!
Fret not to roam the desert now with all thy winged speed,
I may not mount on thee again—thou'rt sold, my Arah steed!
Fret not with that impatient hoof—snuff not the breezy wind;
The farther that thou flyest now, so far am I behind!
The stranger hath thy bridle-rein, thy master hath his gold—Fleet-limbed and beautiful, farewell—thou'rt sold, my steed, thou'rt sold!
Farewell! those free, untired limbs full many a mile must roam,
To reach the chill and wintry clime that clouds the stranger's home;
Some other hand, less kind, must now thy corn and hed prepare;
That silky mane I braided once must be another's care.
The morning sun shall dawn again—but nevermore with thee Shall I gallop o'er the desert paths where we were wont to be;
Evening shall darken on the earth, and o'er the sandy plain
Some other steed with slower pace shall bear me home again.
Only in sleep shall I behold that dark eye glancing bright—
Only in sleep shall hear again that step so firm and light!
And when I raise my dreaming arms to cluck or cheer thy speed,
Then must I startle wake to feel thou'rt sold, my Arah steed!
Ah, rudely then, unseen by me, some cruel hand may chide, Till foam-wreaths lie, like crested waves, along thy panting side.
And the rich blood that's in thee swells in thy indignant pain, Till careless eyes that on thee gaze may count each starting vein.
Will they ill-use thee? If I thought—but no, it can not be;
Thou art so swift, yet easy curbed; so gentle, yet so free;
And yet if haply when thou'rt gone this lonely heart should yearn,
Can the hand that cast thee from it now command thee to return?
"Return!" Alas, my Arah steed! what wilt thy master do,
When thou that wast his all of joy hast vanished from his view?
When the dim distance greets mine eyes, and through the gathering tears
Thy bright form for a moment like the false mirage appears?
Slow and unmounted will I roam with wearied foot alone,
Where, with fleet step and joyous hound, thou oft hast borne me on,
And sitting down by the green well, I'll pause, and sadly think,
"Twas here he hewed his glossy neck when last I saw him drink."
When last I saw thee drink?—Away? the fever dream is o'er!
I could not live a day and know that we should meet no more:
They tempted me, my beautiful—for hunger's power is strong—
They tempted me, my beautiful,—but I have loved too long.
Who said that I had given thee up? Who said that thou wert sold?
'Tis false, 'tis false, my Arah steed! I fling them back their gold!
Thus—thus I leap upon thy hack, and scour the distant plains!
Away! who overtakes us now shall claim thee for his pains.
—Caroline Elizabeth Norton.

The United States is preparing to take a census of the seals of the Alaska sealing grounds. It is a comparatively easy job, as the herds usually gather on two islands. It is estimated that about 600,000 seal noses will be counted this year, and about 25,000 of these will be decorating feminine shoulders before the snow flies.

Telephone officials predict that Detroit's population in 1940 will be 2,250,000. It is now quite 1,000,000.

THE STORY OF A MUSICAL CRITIC.

Mr. James Gibbons Huneker Writes Frankly of His Life and of His Friends.

The discovery that Mr. James Gibbons Huneker had written his autobiography in two volumes was a gratifying one. The gratification was momentarily tempered by the further discovery that a large number of initial pages had been devoted to an apology, to the author's birth, to his grandfathers, his family life, and his school days. We were disposed to think that such matters as birth and parentage might be taken for granted even in these days of the unusual, and that the best way to begin an autobiography was to plunge in medias res. But even this momentary shadow was dissipated by the easy charm with which Mr. Huneker relates the events that are so often a weariness. They are no more than a peg upon which to hang his memories of distinguished men and places, an excuse for reproducing some of the atmosphere of the days that are gone. None the less, and in the exercise of a certain autocratic power, the reviewer may beg leave to skip these pages so long as his review is concerned, but with the earnest advice to the reader not to follow his example.

Mr. Huneker tells us that he was born prematurely—and here we will venture to disagree with him—that he is a Catholic, although a "hickory Catholic," and that he always had a great fondness for the Jews, which may almost be taken for granted in a lover of music. Lord Beaconsfield mentions Rossini, Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn, Pasta, and Grisi as among Jewish musicians, but their name is legion:

I have stood a lot of good-natured fun poked at me for my Jewish propensity. I can stand that, as there is a solid substratum of history for my speculations. Some years ago the Contemporary Review printed an article entitled "The Jew in Music," with this motto from Oscar Wilde's Salome: "The Jews believe only in what they can not see." The writer's name was signed: A. E. Keeton. Not even the assertion that Beethoven was a Belgian is half so iconoclastic as some of the assumptions made in this study. "When Mozart first appeared as a prodigy before the future Queen of France, Marie Antoinette, she announced that 'a genius must not be a Jew.'" The original name Ozart was changed. Mozart was baptised. Which anecdote makes the scalp to freeze, though not because of its verisimilitude. Beethoven and Rubinstein looked alike; ergo! But then they didn't. In the case of Chopin he was certainly Jewish-looking, especially in the Winterhalter and Kwiatkowski portraits. His father came from Nancy, in Lorraine, thickly populated by Jews. The original name, Szopen, or Szop, is Jewish. His music, especially the first Scherzo in B minor, has a Heine-like irony, and irony is a prime characteristic of the Chosen (or Choosing, as Zangwill puts it) race. But all this is in the key of wildest surmise. Wagner was born in the ghetto at Leipzig; yet that didn't make him Jewish, any more than the baptism of Mendelssohn made him Christian. Georges Bizet was of Jewish origin; he looked Jewish; but the fact that he married the daughter of Halévy (Ha-Levi), the composer of "La Juive," didn't make the composer of "Carmen" a Jew. Neither religion nor nationality are more than superficial factors in the nature of men and women. Race alone counts.

Mr. Huneker devotes a whole chapter to "The Girls." How can the honest male autobiographer do otherwise. There is no denying, he says, the single-heartedness of a boy's first love. It may be for a married woman. Indeed it usually is. He never went quite so far as to take Stendhal's advice and "make love to every woman he happened to find alone," but he admits that he made love to some of them:

I was born with a Quaker foot. I often wonder what girls see in hobbledoys. They are, I know, a continual source of amusement. I was. My dancing gave great pleasure to the children; but as I could tinkle pretty tunes for others to foot the mazy dance I was occasionally rewarded with a bright look. Kissing was never attempted. I contend that a boy's mind at a certain period is as pure as a girl's. (A pure girl, of course.) Youth is pure just because it is youth, says Dostoevsky. Vague desires assail him, at which he blushes, but for unadulterated chivalry, give me the average lad who blushes when his mother tells him "Mamie is coming over tonight, Jack, hurry, wash your face and don't forget to change your collar." Forget to change his collar! Wash his face, forsooth! With a Byronic scowl, which is not missed by his sympathetic mother—and sneered at by his cynical aunt—he stalks out of the room, and for a full hour faces his glass, alternately admiring and distrusting his pulchritude. The boy who doesn't make an ass of himself over a girl is apt to miss out later in his manhood. It meant something, the toga virilis of the Romans; at once a symbol of virility and sex-initiation.

Mr. Huneker proudly confesses that he was a victim of the "petticoat mania." His father's mockery and his mother's delicate warnings fell upon deaf ears. Such parental counsels always do. And as for the girls themselves, they jeered at him, but they remained companions:

I recall a dark-skinned, black-haired girl who was nicknamed Portuguese Annie. She was a nicely behaved miss of seventeen and one of those apathetic flirts. She never regarded you except from a great height, unless another girl became too friendly, then hawk-like she would swoop down on her innocent prey—meaning my lamb-like self—and carry him away to her fastness, there to be dropped into the next nest of her indifference. She piqued, did Portuguese Annie—why Portuguese, I never found out; perhaps because she was Irish. I met her of rainy nights in Fairmount Park. We went around the Reservoir. At times we sat on wet benches, an umbrella lifted, her cloak about us. When the guardian of public morals shooed us away we sought another bench, and potential pneumonia. What was our conversation? I've forgotten. Probably chaste and silly. One night as we walked about Logan Square, a lame man hobbled in front of us, then he limped to our rear. A spy? A relative? I warned Annie. She didn't recognize him and he so maneuvered that I couldn't. At the advanced hour of 9 we separated—and forever. The reason I never saw her again was a simple one. That lame man was my elder brother playing detective. At home he warned me that I was a sentimental ass. I openly admitted it. There was other balm in Gilead. The charms of Portuguese Annie had begun to pall. The Eternal Feminine led me upward and on.

Mr. Huneker wanted to go to Paris, naturally enough. But how was he to go? There was no money available for such a purpose, and yet for a long time he avoided every opportunity where money might be acquired. Finally we find him offering himself as a clerk to the Chickering piano agency in Philadelphia:

When customers entered I had to accost them. Once I was showing off my paces on a second-hand instrument before a prospective purchaser, a woman, whose face expressed repugnance. Mr. Dutton supervened: "James," he suggested, "clean that case with the feather-duster. I'll show the lady the piano"; and he began playing Gottschalk's "Cradle Song" with a touch that melted her heart. She bought the piano. After she went away he said to me with a characteristic glance over his eye-glasses, "It all depends on the way it's done, young man. If your touch is too truthful with a shaky old piano you will never sell it." It was a grand lesson in worldly ethics for me. I never forgot it. And when I read Ibsen's statement that all truths grow old or stale after twenty years, I think of Mr. Dutton and his second-hand piano.

And so Paris came at last, but financial considerations demanded the cheapest available passage and consequently the journey was an inferno. He says it was horrible with the smell of bad tobacco, alcohol, unwashed bodies, and vile breaths:

Next morning I sought the head steward and asked him why I was covered with little red spots. He at once explained that the salt air affected the blood, that—"but," I interrupted, "the salt air doesn't run over the bed with legs, does it?" My crudeness made him blush. "Ah, Monsieur," he deprecatingly replied, "some things must be. The fare is cheap, and if you find certain other passengers, well—the company doesn't charge extra for their passage." It was now my turn to blush. I was drop-ripe in my verdancy, but the cynicism of this elderly person pained me. What a rascal he was. He plundered me of my five-franc piece, whether in making change or charging for extras—tobacco, coffee. The wine was free. It was also poisonous. I ordered a better vintage—a vin bleu that rasped my throat, but I could get it down. When I saw the sea it was as flat as a temperance lecture. I was disappointed because of its wet monotony. I quoted Landor to help me out: "Is this the mighty ocean?—is this all?" Like the girl in the Stendhal novel who found love insipid, I felt like asking: "Is that all?"

Economy was the rule in Paris. Music was cheap, but food was dear and, after all, it was the music that counted. None the less the body had its claims that could not be wholly ignored:

But I didn't always dine luxuriously. I continued to rove and forage, and as that noble American institution, free-lunch, was unknown, I had little to spare when rent day arrived. One night a fellow-lodger took me to the Halles, the central markets, and after a tour through the labyrinths, which Zola faithfully describes in "Le Ventre de Paris," he showed me a trick that I shall never forget. We found ourselves behind one of the halls, with a dozen vagabonds, one in shabby evening dress and top-boots, but bare-headed, mostly human wrecks, drunkards and outlaws from society. They were in jolly mood, evidently cognac of the worst sort was in their veins. They were hungry. Like a band of wolves we watched a big cauldron over a fire, in which simmered a mass of meat and vegetables, the scourgings of the butcher's block and huckster's droppings. Fire and water are purifying, and this indescribable olla-podrida fumed and bubbled and sent to our nostrils a most tempting odor. A human hog in rags stirred the pot-au-feu with a baton fit for a wash boiler. As he stirred he hoarsely chanted: "One cent a try, one cent only." The trial was this: as the whirling mass tossed up fragments of flesh, hunks of fat, potatoes, or carrots, you jabbed at them with a long wooden fork, and what you prodded on the prongs was yours. Only one cent. It would have been amusing if it hadn't been horrible. The gambling instinct, as well as hunger, was appealed to, and the low price proved an irresistible combination. I found it so. I speared like my neighbors and had fair luck, a lump of veal, which I ate with good appetite. No bread. No wine. These we found across the street. I never returned to this slop-bucket lottery.

Then Mr. Huneker tells us that he fell in love once more, and with a married woman, although he does not seem to have known that the fair Coralie was already preëmpted, so to speak. The lady was most unromantically fond of beefsteak and her lover had to gratify this craving:

The family had nicknamed her Madame Bifsteak, because of her carnivorous propensity, and by consequence I was called Monsieur Beefsteak. The dog remained plain dog till his next sausage—karma. With warmer weather my stove became an impediment; because of it I was forced to put on my shirt in the hall. A burst of generosity made me offer it to Madame Bifsteak. Her eyes shone like glorious lamps. I was assured that she loved me. I paid for another rare steak. We were almost happy. And then came the disagreeable surprise. One evening, after dinner, as we sipped our liqueurs, a burly coachman entered, whip in hand, and saluted the company. A swift exchange of glances. "It's her husband," some one whispered to me. "Le mari!" that name consecrated by melodrama. My Coralie's husband! Horrible. He was nearly seven feet tall, weighed two hundred and fifty pounds, at least, wore the capes and glazed high hat of his profession, and also the professional red mug. He was drunk, indeed, was never sober, and odd to relate, when he opened his mouth to speak, I expected to hear a rich Irish brogue, so much like a Dublin jaunting-car driver did he look. But he spoke French mixed with the argot of the quarter. An awe-inspiring creature. I had been sitting with my arm around the waist of Coralie, having lulled the jealousy of P-paul with a bone. Unostentatiously I withdrew this incriminating arm when I learned the title of the stranger. What! Had my Coralie Bifsteak fooled me all along? Oh, grass where is thy greenness? Oh, beef where is thy price? I didn't have an opportunity to ponder the situation. The big devil looked at me and to my terror strode—yes, he had plenty of stride—towards me. "Ah, Monsieur Stove, it's you? Embrace your papa, young man!" He held me in a grip of steel. Mr. Stove! What did he mean? I had been saluted as Beefsteak, never as Stove. His bear-like hug nearly smothered me, I was hopelessly outclassed from the start. The audience tittered, but soon became silent. It was to be serious! Suddenly after a volley of oburgations, I was tripped up and found myself across his knees, and next to his "wife." She placidity stared like a cow in a thunder-shower. Then I was ignominiously spanked, spanked as my father never dreamed of spanking me. The family roared with laughter. The Bernards only smiled. It was a joke! This M. Stove was such a funny fellow! At the words Stove ("la poêle") the gaiety redoubled.

There are innumerable stories of the musical celebrities of that day. Among them were Galli-Marie, the original Carmen, Georges Bizet, Anna Bock, and Frédéric Boscovitz. There were other celebrities, too, such as Honoré Daumier, the artist, whose drinking proclivities seem to have been compatible with long life:

Honoré Daumier died in 1879 at the advanced age of seventy-seven. He must have been pickled in alcohol, but, unlike Monticelli, the evoker of gorgeous landscapes, the great caricaturist, still greater painter, did not touch absinthe. He loved brandy. It didn't hurt his art, nor did absinthe hurt the art of Ziem, who lived to be ninety, but the poison killed Monticelli. It was simply a survival of the fittest tank. Daumier's modesty was proverbial. He was a close friend of Corot and Daubigny. One day Daubigny introduced him to a rich American picture dealer (are there any poor ones?) and warned him not to ask less than 5000 francs for the first picture. This he did. The American paid the price, then begged for more. Daumier showed him another canvas. How much? The artist was perplexed. Daubigny had said nothing about a second picture. Embarrassed, he replied, "500 francs." "Don't want it," said the other. "I don't like it, as well as the first; besides, I never sell any but dear pictures." Daumier delighted in repeating this rather doubtful story. But a witicism of his was afterwards appropriated by Jimmy Whistler. Emboldened by his encounter with the American dealer, Daumier had asked a wealthy amateur 50,000 francs for a beautiful picture. The man looked around the shabby atelier and then at the artist as if he had been an escaped lunatic. "What, monsieur! for that little canvas, 50,000 francs?" "My posthumous price, monsieur!" proudly responded Daumier. The picture was one of his Don Quixote and Sancho Panza compositions, and its posthumous price was double what the painter had asked for it.

Poverty has its compensations and Mr. Huneker freely acknowledges them. Poverty is the friend of virtue and the enemy of vice. Industry is sometimes spurred by the empty stomach, and Mr. Huneker tells us that he studied with commendable diligence and kept himself in the paths of virtue:

I was too busy, also too poor, to experience the Parisian "vice" in quest of which good Americans travel thousands of miles. Of all the deadly dull spectacles, commend me to the Moulin Rouge or the Bal Bullier. When one is young it's another matter; but one must be very young to enjoy the high kicking by a lot of plain Janes, deficient alike in art or under-clothing. The French girl "on the loose" is not lovely, though Paris orders that sort of thing better than in London—where the halting march of the female mob in Piccadilly Circus is the dreariest picture in the world. There was more fun in the impromptu dances at the barriers in the suburbs. Poor working girls, clerks on a lark, workmen in their shirt-sleeves, art students and their Mimi or their Aglaé, all furiously footing in the abandonment of a dance the elementary music made by a screeching cornet, a rasping fiddle, with the brassy sonorities of a piano as a background—there was a joy of life not to be found at such mournful professional gardens, the Jardin de Paris, the Folies Marigny, those slaughter-houses of love, where, as Huysmans wrote, love is slain at a stroke. Yet the American, green as grass, whether he hails from Manhattan or Manitoba, accepts the stenciled humbuggery of the boulevards and Montmartre as the "real thing." Life has its terrible revenges on those who flout her in youth. One of them is vice for the middle-aged in Paris.

The author eventually found himself in Rome, but he was far too modest to aspire to an audience with the Pope until he heard accidentally that such a thing was by no means impossible. Three hundred pilgrims had arrived in the eternal city, and the hotel proprietor assured him that he might join them and that evening dress was by no means indispensable. "That was a custom in the more exacting days of Leo XIII. Pope Pius X is a democrat. He hates vain show. Possibly he has absorbed the English antipathy to seeing evening dress on a male during daylight. But the ladies must wear lace veils in lieu of hats. I was in high spirits. I was to see the Pope!"

This time it was not a false alarm. From a gallery facing the Sistine Chapel entered the inevitable Swiss Guard, followed by the officers of the Papal household, a knot of ecclesiastics wearing purple; Monsignor Pick, the Papal protonotary and a man of importance; then a few stragglers—anonymous persons, stout, bald officials—finally Pope Pius X. He was attired in purest white, even to the sash that encompassed his plump little person. A gold cross depended from his neck. He held out his hand to be kissed in the most matter-of-fact way. I noted the whiteness of the nervously energetic hand tendered me, which bore the ring of Peter, a large square emerald surrounded by diamonds. Though seventy, he looked ten years younger. He was slightly under medium height. His hair was white, his face dark, red, veined, and not healthy. He needed more air and exercise. The great gardens of the Vatican Palace were no compensation for this man, homesick for the sultry lagoons and stretches of gleaming waters in his old diocese at Venice. If the human in him could have called out, it would have voiced Venice, not the Vatican. The flesh of his face was what painters call "ecclesiastical," that is, coarse in grain; his nose broad, unaristocratic, his brows strong and harmonious. His eyes may have been brown, but they seemed black, brilliant, piercing. He moved with silent alertness. I saw with satisfaction the shapely ears, musical ears, their lobes freely detached. A certain resemblance to Pius IX there was, but not so amiable looking. I found another than the Pope I had expected. This, then, was the man of sorrows, the exile, though in his native land, a prisoner within sight of the city over which he was the spiritual ruler, a prince of all principalities and dominions. Withal a feeble old man whose life would have been imperiled if he had ventured into the streets of Rome.

Here we must leave the first volume of Mr. Huneker's reminiscences, but with the prospect of a further dip into the second volume. Such autobiographies as this are a pure delight.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

The San Francisco Clearing House Association reported clearings for the four-day week ended Saturday at $117,000,000, as compared with $147,000,000 for the five-day week ended September 13, 1919. Saturday's clearings were $28,500,000.

Total gold reserves of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco gained $3,312,000 during the week ending September 10th, according to Saturday's weekly statement. Gold in the bank rose $1,189,000; total reserves, $3,199,000; total bills on hand, $367,000; total earning assets, $478,000; and total resources, $3,292,000.

The railroad section of the stock market has been looking up of late in a somewhat belated response to the rate increases. There is room, indeed, for vast speculation in some of our gas, electric light and traction rates, public utilities begin to loom in the market as affording the same sort of bargain opportunities recently furnished by the rails. Many of the public utility stocks and most of the bonds seem to be extremely cheap throughout the country. There seems to have been going on definite accumulation in a good many of these stocks, and in view of the earnings tendency, which justifies larger dividends, it would not be surprising to see Philadelphia Company lead some very marked improvement in this section of the list.

There are a good many specialties that are particularly worthy of attention at current prices. American Express, though not returning much on the investment at present prices, has tremendous prospects in connection with its foreign banking department. For special considerations stocks like Remington Typewriter, Worthington Pump, National Lead, Nova Scotia Steel, Gulf States Steel, and Corn Products are worth buying for the long pull. Marine Preferred around 75 returns 8 per cent. on its regular dividend, and has something like $40 due in back dividends, which certainly marks it as a speculative investment of no mean order.

It may be emphatically and unequivocally denied that the Transportation Act, which is sometimes referred to as the Esch-Cummins bill, guarantees the railroads an assured income of 6 per cent., or any percentage whatever, beginning with September 1, 1920. Prior to that time the majority of the railroads had contracts with the government guaranteeing them the same compensation they received under Federal control.

Section 422 of the Transportation Act requires the commission to make rates which will give under honest, efficient, and economical management a fair return on the value of the railway property used in the service of the public. This fair return is fixed for the two years beginning March 1, 1920, at 5 1/2 per cent. per annum, on such aggregate value. The commission may in its discretion add not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent. to make provision for improvements, betterments, or equipment chargeable to capital account. The Interstate Commerce Commission allowed both percentages.

After March 1, 1922, the rate of interest is to be fixed by the commission. The act further recognizes that it is inevitable that some of the carriers will receive a net income in excess of such fair return and provides as to any carrier which receives such an income in excess of a fair return that one-half of the excess is to be paid to and loaned by the United States to other carriers for meeting expenditures for capital account, refunding maturing securities originally issued for capital account, or purchasing equipment and facilities, which equipment and facilities are to be purchased by the government and leased to the carriers.

The other half goes into a fund to be maintained by the carrier under the commission's supervision for the purpose of paying the dividends or interest on its stocks and bonds or rent for leased roads. When that fund reaches 5 per cent. of the value of the carriers' property, the carrier may retain its half of the excess and use it for any lawful purpose. Nowhere does the act guarantee that the rates fixed under the act will produce any definite rate of return on the investment. It is not even claimed by the Interstate Commerce Commission in its recent order that the increases it makes will have that effect. It is only said in effect that it is hoped that they will.

The government does not guarantee any of the outstanding bonds or securities of the carriers either as to interest or principal. It does not undertake to make up any such amounts or any operating deficit from the fund created by the excess above referred to. The carriers to whom that fund may be loaned are entirely within the commission's discretion.

E. H. Rollins & Sons have received from the Southern California Edison Company the following remarkably fine earnings statement for the month of July, 1920: Gross earnings, $1,524,458; operating expenses and taxes, $609,562; net earnings, $914,896; monthly proportion of funded debt interest, $303,293; balance before depreciation, $611,603. The gross earnings showed an increase of about $515,000, or 51 per cent., and the net earnings an increase of $327,000, or 55 per cent., over the figures for July, 1919. For the year ended July 31, 1920, gross earnings were reported at $12,305,372, and net earnings at $6,762,479.

The recovery which France is making is not generally realized by the people of the United States, and the following facts and figures derived from an article called "Again 'The Miracle of the Marne,'" by Herbert S. Houston, in the September issue of the World's Work, are of interest as showing the progress which that country has made in agricultural and industrial rehabilitation:

1. The government has advanced to the people 9,609,082,916 francs for agricultural and industrial reconstruction.

2. 5345 out of 6443 schools have been reopened.

3. Built or rebuilt: 28,200 temporary wooden dwellings, 16,800 permanent stone dwellings, 28,300 wooden barracks; total, 73,500.

4. Of 9,675,000 acres rendered unfit for cultivation by war, 80 per cent. has been cleared of projectiles and 70 per cent. cleared of barbed wire and trenches filled in.

5. The farmers work, not eight hours, but from dawn to dusk.

6. In invaded regions population is now over 4,000,000, more than twice that at time of armistice and 75 per cent. of pre-war total.

7. Experiments show that nearly all soil can be restored to productivity.

8. Farmers are forming hundreds of co-operative societies to buy farm tractors.

9. In 1920 the devastated region will raise enough crops for its own food.

10. The government is supplying manufacturers with credit sufficient to rebuild plants at present cost.

11. On May 1, 1920, 2627 of the 3508 destroyed factories (66 per cent.) were in operation and 300,000 workers were employed.

12. Germany tried to destroy utterly the Lens coal mines by flooding, etc., but by the end of 1920 the water will be pumped out and in 1922 the mines will be producing again. In 1925-26 production will be 75 per cent. of pre-war normal.

13. 1100 kilometers of canals were destroyed. Virtually all of these are now reopened to navigation.

14. All destroyed railways have been rebuilt and reopened.

In connection with France's commercial position in the world, it is interesting to note that during the first five months of this year French exports increased by 182 per cent. over the figure for the same period of 1919, while imports increased only 17 per cent. This improved France's trade balance by 2,000,000,000 francs.

Some critics have complained that France is shirking in the matter of taxation, but as a matter of fact she is paying a tax which is, per capita, relatively higher (when relative resources are considered) than England's.

We quote as follows from Mr. Houston's article:

"The lie that France is not at work should be seared on the lips of every one who utters it. If she is not at work how can she be reclaiming her fields, rebuilding her roads and houses and factories and towns, and re-establishing the shattered life over one-fifth of her territory? That she is doing this any one can see who visits France or who takes the small trouble to look up the facts. And she is doing it before she has received the indemnity pledged to her by the peace treaty and repudiated again and again by every one of her allies.

"The France of today, struggling with the seemingly superhuman task of lifting herself from the ashes of ruin, seems to be sustained by the invisible army of nearly a million and a half of her sons who sleep in her soil.

"France has more property-owners in proportion to her population than any country in the world. She has more investors. She has democratized property rights so they are practically coextensive with human rights. By making the two virtually interchangeable she has protected both. France has pointed the one safe way to maintain the rights of private property. Within her borders those rights are universally exercised and enjoyed; and because of that they are universally defended. France has a greater thing than her economic power, great as that power is—she has the supreme gift of democratic justice.

"Fundamental character is the surest basis for credit."

The Cities Service Company continued to show material progress in earnings for July and the seven months ending July 31st. Gross earnings for July were $2,117,919, an increase of $534,197 above the figures for July, 1919. After providing for all expenses and interest, net income for July was $1,900,084.08, an increase of $550,146, with a balance, available for reserve, dividends on the common stock and surplus, for the month of $1,510,269, a gain of $513,310. For the seven months ended July 31, 1920, gross earnings were $14,861,219, an increase of $2,514,678 above the corresponding period of 1919.

Mr. David Blankenhorn of the Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company returned Friday from a trip to the Northwest. He found a very optimistic feeling for the future among the bankers and business men in the principal cities he visited. On his trip he took in Portland, Seattle, and Vancouver.

ratio will operate to alter some estimates, and when there is an overbought position in the rails this argument will probably be brought forward to explain a change in the market trend.

The declining tendency in the prices of commodities is still operating to affect speculation in many industrials. The bear party is continually probing the industrial list for weak places and at times the market seems as short of buying orders as at other times it is short of selling pressure. Following the rate increases granted to the railroads and recent government bureau recommendations regarding public utilities, and indeed favorable action from time to time in different parts of the country in the matter of increases in pool, a distance of 193.5 miles, but in his own country he can be whisked from San Francisco to Red Bluff, 198 miles, for $10.20, including $3 Pullman.

The English rate from Manchester to Aberdeen—363.50 miles—is $23.89, and the Southern Pacific rate from San Francisco to Santa Barbara, 367 miles, is $13.26, with a Pullman charge of $3.75.
The same comparison, it is said, holds true with the rates from Paris, France, to various points on the Continent. The traveler going from Paris to Antwerp, 226.18 miles, pays $14.14, whereas in this country he can go from San Francisco to Fresno, 205 miles, for $7.44, plus $3 Pullman.

The Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company and Shingle, Brown & Co. report a ready sale for the 7 per cent. bonds of the Market Street Realty Company, which they are now offering. Secured by property situated on one of the busiest corners in the city, it is an ideal form of security. Offerings of this character, secured by real estate of established value and retired serially, have always been popular in the local market. The property and building have been appraised at twice the value of the mortgage. Earnings are three times the first year interest, or three times the amount necessary to retire the first maturity plus interest on the whole issue.

There has not been the radical reduction in loan accounts in our banks we have been hoping for by this time, and commodity loans, especially where any attempt at profiteering is suggested, will continue under the ban until this situation rights itself. Consequently we may look for bankers to restrict loans on grains as well as other agricultural products. Haste to market crops as they mature will soon begin to react harshly on the markets for the grains and for wheat and corn especially. Canada seems to have very good wheat prospects this year, and the foreign exchange situation works in favor of Canadian wheat for export purposes as against our own. Meantime our crop prospects continue very fair. Corn prices seem to be in the circumstances exceptionally high.

Due to temporary requirements and lack of ability to make deliveries efficiently, there have been some advances here and there in steel and iron prices. On the other hand, while the railroads are demanding an enormous amount of rails and equipment the financing of these demands is a grave problem, especially as banking interests seem to feel that prices in the steel trade have also seen their top and must eventually break very sharply.
Very little relatively is being done in the copper market, but whenever Europe is in position to draw on us liberally for raw material there should be a much better market for copper, which, incidentally, seems cheaper relatively than the majority of metals.

Mr. Garretson Dulin of the Los Angeles office of the Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company was a visitor in this city for a day this week, having motored up from the south.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company is mailing the following important circular on readjustments to their clients:
"Has it occurred to you that the 50 per cent. mortgage of today on city homes and country farms approximates a 100 per cent. valuation of a few years ago? How long can these inflated values keep up?
"Daily fresh evidences show that commodity values are shrinking. There is direct relation between the values of staples, crop values, and land values. When crop values advance land values keep pace. When crop values fall land values drop.
"The values of high-grade bonds run conversely. A falling market for commodities increases demand for real security. Bond values advance in indirect ratio with falling commodity prices.
"Has it occurred to you that taxes from which municipal bonds are paid run ahead of any mortgage debt and in event of necessity to foreclose to protect ones' loan he must pay up all taxes, street improvement liens, etc.? Taxes for paying bonds and bond interest attach directly to the land and can not be evaded.
"Municipal bonds are exempt from Federal income tax. The decision of the United States Supreme Court rendered June 1, 1920, establishes that the United States constitutionally is powerless to tax either the principal or the income derived from municipal bonds. This definitely settles the question.
"Certainly the present is the time to sell real estate and land securities and buy American municipal bonds that are obtainable to yield as high as 7 per cent., income tax exempt. Canadian municipals and province bonds, equally desirable from a security standpoint and which are tax exempt in Canada, offer considerably better income return; running safely as high as 8 per cent. as the result of present exchange conditions. The existing high premium for the American dollar permits the purchase and distribution of Canadian bonds at liberal discounts."

California's "gold mine above ground," its citrus fruit industry, has returned to the fruit-growers of the state during the past year the tidy sum of approximately $81,200,000, according to the annual report of the citrus fruit industry issued recently.

While Los Angeles and vicinity produced 87 per cent. of the oranges and 97 per cent. of the lemons grown in the state, 11 per cent. of the orange crop is produced in the Fresno-Porterville district. This same district produced 2 1/2 per cent. of the lemon yield.
Sacramento and Oroville also contribute to the orange production of the state, the crop in this district amounting to 2 per cent.
The cost of handling this entire output was 11.3 per cent. of the total figure, according to the report. Statistics show this to be the lowest marketing cost of any perishable food product in America.
California has produced 46,757 carloads of the world's output of citrus fruits, an increase of nearly 1000 cars over the production of last year, according to the report of General Manager G. Harold Powell of the California Fruit Growers' Exchange. Segregated, by carloads, the production was: Oranges and grape fruit, 38,077; lemons, 8680.
Of the entire output of the state, the Exchange handled 73.7 per cent. of the production, or 12,144,964 boxes of oranges, 226,266 boxes of grapefruit, 3,452,534 boxes of lemons, approximately half of which was of the Sun-kist brand. This is an increase of 1.4 per cent. over the proportion of the crop handled by the Exchange last year. The returns to members of the Exchange for fruit shipped by it, including estimated value of carloads yet unsold, will be approximately $59,221,329.
Although there has been a general upward trend in the price of all foodstuffs, the expense of marketing the citrus fruits of California is shown to be lower than it was ten years ago and the lowest marketing cost for any perishable food product in America. This is made possible through cooperative marketing.
The freight bill of shippers will mean an increase of nearly $6,000,000 annually. This has not added to the retail cost of California's citrus fruits.
"Prices received from perishable farm products are determined by the conditions of supply and demand, and the impact of world wholesale prices, while the costs of production or transportation exert only a remote influence," says General Manager Powell of the Exchange in his report. "The citrus fruit-grower finds it impossible to pass on to the consumer these increased costs. He can get only what the public is willing to pay. The producer of perishables must sell, even at a loss, or allow his products to rot in the fields."
There are 10,500 members in the California Fruit-Growers' Exchange, an increase of 500 new members over the membership of last year. These members, fruit-growers, control the Exchange and elect the officers and directorate, thus having direct voice in the cooperative and non-profit system which has proved to be such a success with the citrus fruit industry.
The Fruit-Growers' Supply Company, organized by Exchange members for the purpose of purchasing grove and packing-house materials at cost, transacted during the year business in excess of $8,500,000. The lumber operations alone, for the making of boxes, at Hilt in the northern part of the state, totals $1,676,000.
In San Francisco the Supply Company lumber sales office has sold upper grades of lumber not needed for box manufacturing purposes for which it received $691,000.
At Susanville the Supply Company now has under construction a monster sawmill and box factory which will deliver to growers next season one million boxes at cost of manufacture.
The very latest figures of the exports of manufactures—those of July—give further evidence that the big gains in exports of manufactures have "come to stay." Manufactures exported in the dull export month of July, says a statement of the National City Bank of New York, average $11,000,000 a day against $7,500,000 per day in July of last year, and for the seven months ending with July average $11,500,000 per day against $9,333,000 in the same months of last year. The total exports of manufactures in July, 1920, including the two groups, "manufactures ready for use" and "manufactures for further use in manufacturing," aggregated $343,000,000 against $234,000,000 in July of last year, and in the seven months ending with July were $2,451,000,000 against $2,000,000,000 in the same months of last year. The chief increase occurred in the group "manufactures ready for use," of which the exports in July were $264,000,000 against $167,000,000 in July of last year, and for the seven months ending with July $1,849,000,000 against $1,479,000,000 in the same months of last year.
Another indication of the growing share which manufactures form of our exports is found in the fact that the increase in exports, both in July and in the seven months ending with July, occurs entirely in the trade with

A Good Investment

We shall be pleased to explain in detail the many attractive features of SUTTER BASIN COMPANY 8% BONDS. They combine a very high rate of interest with most unusual security.

Furthermore, they suit the investment requirements of every one.

They can be bought to mature in from three to nine years, and in denominations of $100, $500 or $1000.

Mr. J. Ogden Armour of Chicago unconditionally guarantees them by endorsement on the back of each bond.

those sections of the world in which manufactures form the bulk of our exports. Manufactures form in normal times, continues the bank's statement, about 70 per cent. of the merchandise sent by us to our neighbors in North America, over 80 per cent. of those to South America, 80 per cent. of those to Asia, nearly 90 per cent. of those to Oceania, and about 75 per cent. of those sent to Africa, while they form in normal times but about 33 per cent. of those sent to Europe.

The Adorable Dreamer.

With a sincere desire to fall in love with all the heroines of fiction it sometimes happens that our heart remains cold to the blandishments of some particular charmer. It is so in this instance. We do not quite understand how it is that Penelope has so many sweethearts, transferring her affections from one to the other with such rapidity that sometimes they overlap. Penelope has written a novel, a daring one, and belongs therefore to the fraternity of the Bohemians. Her lover, Tony, wants her to write another and watches anxiously for the dawning of inspiration. By way of expediting the process he refuses to kiss her, which shows us just how much he knows about inspiration. Then Penelope falls in love with a naval person whose views on kissing are of the well-known maritime kind. Then she goes to Portugal on some vague governmental mission and falls in love with some one else. These adventures, it may be noted, are concurrent and not consecutive. Penelope has great love powers, and if suitor number three wishes for our advice it would be to marry her at once while the marrying is good.

THE ADORABLE DREAMER. By Elizabeth Kirby. New York: George H. Doran Company.

The Black Knight.

This energetic and well-balanced novel should not be allowed to pass unnoticed in the crowd. Not only does it contain plenty of good characterization, but its picture of life on the Canadian prairie ranches is one that we would not willingly miss.

Michael Thorley is the son of a wealthy but fraudulent company promoter whose schemes come to grief and who then commits suicide. Michael, penniless and thrown on his own resources, goes to Canada. He is a tenderfoot and he has to pass through the physical inferno of a first introduction to farm labor. Then come winter and unemployment. Michael tries the lumber camps and is brutally swindled. He has no better luck at prospecting, and then he becomes a clerk in an Ontario country bank. He saves the life of the little daughter of a millionaire and in return he is given a stock exchange tip, but the only way he can make use of it is by borrowing the money of the bank. The tip is all that it professes to be and Michael could have replaced the borrowed money in the vaults but for the fact that he meets with an accident and can not reach the bank in time to evade detection. None the less he is now a rich man, which he may regard as some consolation for the two years' imprisonment to which he is sentenced.

Michael's further adventures must be left to the discovery of the reader, who will be well rewarded by a story free from the elements of the sensational and the improbable.

THE BLACK KNIGHT. By Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick and Crosbie Garstin. New York: Henry Holt & Co.

Heart Disease.

If you have shortness of breath, tenderness in the region of the liver, and swollen feet—all at the same time—you have heart disease and you may drop dead. Otherwise there is nothing the matter with your heart that you need worry much about so far as its sudden failure is concerned. We gather this information from Dr. Bishop's "Heart Troubles: Their Prevention and Relief."

Dr. Bishop does not believe in a medical reticence toward the patient. He thinks that the sufferer should have the nature of his malady clearly explained to him in order that he may more intelligently cooperate in the cure. It is to this end that he writes his book. He tells us all about the various kinds of heart disease, how they are caused and how they may be alleviated. It may often be noted that our dread of a disease lessens with familiarity. Things are seldom quite so bad as they seem. Certainly it is so in this instance, and for this reason it may be confidently recommended to those suffering from weak hearts that they buy Dr. Bishop's book and find out all about it. It may be the first step to recovery.

HEART TROUBLES: THEIR PREVENTION AND RELIEF. By Louis Faugères Bishop, M. A., M. D., Sc. D., F. A. C. P. New York: Funk & Wagnalls Company.

The Lonely House.

It seems a surprisingly easy thing to commit a murder at Monaco, indeed a whole series of murders, and to "get away with it." A dead body at Monaco is assumed to be that of a suicide, and the less said about suicides the better. Nothing could be worse for business.

Lily Fairfield, an English orphan and rich, goes to Monaco on the invitation of Count and Countess Poldi, who are connected with her family. They live at a lonely place appropriately called La Solitude, and they seem to be desperately poor and wholly wrapped up in their son Beppo, who has military duties in Rome. Lily vaguely senses that there is something mysterious and wrong about the place. There are occasional dinner guests who are lavishly entertained, and the countess is apparently able to send considerable sums of money to the idolized Beppo, who is clearly intended by her to be the husband of Lily. Then comes the discovery by Lily herself of the body of a man who had been a guest at La Solitude a night or two before. It seems to be a clear case of suicide, but Lily takes alarm when the body of another guest is found under similar circumstances. She makes a confidant of two men who traveled across the continent with her, M. Popeau, who turns out to be in the French secret service, and Captain Stuart of the English army, and as a result the precious couple are arrested just as they are about to murder Captain Stuart himself, whose attentions to Lily as a rival of Beppo have made him persona non grata to the ambitious countess. The story is thoroughly well told, as might be expected of an authoress so skilled as Mrs. Lowndes. Evidently she knows Monaco and Monte Carlo intimately, as well as the life in those unwholesome paradises.

THE LONELY HOUSE. By Mrs. Belloc Lowndes. New York: George H. Doran Company.

The Onyx Lobby.

Still another detective story from the pen of Carolyn Wells. Sir Herbert Binney comes to America in order to start a branch business of the celebrated "Binney's Buns." He is found late at night lying dead in the lobby of his fashionable apartment house and by his side is a scrap of paper on which with his dying breath he has written what seems to be the words "women did this."

The story is quite a complicated one and with the inevitable love interest. Moreover, we may extend our acquaintance with that invincible detective, Penny Wise, and his uncanny little assistant, Zizi.

Briefer Reviews.

"Us and the Bortleman," by Edith Ballinger Price (the Century Company), is a story for children. Its setting is by the sea and it has a good and original plot. The illustrations are by the author.

"Master Frisky," by Clarence Hawkes, is a story of a collie puppy. It is for children and it is intended to "teach a better understanding of animal life and a wiser love for one's pets." It is published by the Thomas Y. Crowell Company.

E. P. Dutton & Co. have published "Princess White Flame," by Gertrude Crownfield. It is a fairy story describing the peculiar adventures of Prince Radian and his invisible bride, the princess in the wonderful land of the Fire Kingdom. The illustrations are by Anne Merriman Peck.

The Macmillan Company has published a new and cheaper edition of "The American Red Cross in the Great War," by Henry P. Davison, chairman of the War Council. It may be said that the author's royalties go to the Red Cross. The new book is well illustrated and in every way a desirable possession. The price is $2.

"The Gifts We Bring," by Nina B. Lamkin (T. S. Denison & Co., Chicago), is described as "a Christmas pageant for boys and girls or for grown-ups." It has been produced at Northwestern University and in many schools, colleges, and Y. W. C. A.'s throughout the United States. Directions for production are Glen of the High North.

This is a story of the British Yukon, and a good story, harring a few rather glaring improbabilities. Tom Reynolds falls in love with a girl whom he meets on the street, and we will take the author's word for it that such things actually happen. Reynolds is a reporter and his editor is anxious that he should go in search of a certain wealthy man who had mysteriously disappeared some years before and is supposed to be in hiding or retirement. So Reynolds starts off for the Yukon, and of course he finds that his charmer is on the same steamer. We felt certain she would be. Reynolds loses sight of her when he reaches the gold fields, but by one more curious coincidence he finds that she is the girl whom he rescues from a grizzly bear. It seems that she is living with her father, who has a sort of settlement far from the haunts of men and guarded by a band of trusty Indians who allow no one to approach. None the less Reynolds approaches. Being lost in the wilderness, he embarks on a raft and the river current carries him directly to the spot where he wants to go. Indeed he is rescued by the girl herself. Was ever lover so fortunate? We feel that it is now "up to him" to make good.

Of course he does make good. But there are adventures on the road, perils from bad men, and the usual vicissitudes that we associate with the far north. But Glen is some girl and worth it all.

GLEN OF THE HIGH NORTH. By H. A. Cody. New York: George H. Doran Company.

A Canteen Girl.

The public is not reading war books just at present. It is tired of the war and is trying to persuade itself that it never happened, or at least that it can never happen again. But the cycle of the war books will return. As soon as we get into the right perspective we shall want to view the war from all its many aspects.

Then we shall read these uncensored letters of a canteen girl that come to us from some anonymous source. They are admirably written and without undue intrusion of the almighty ego. The author saw the war at close quarters. She mingled with all sorts and conditions of men and she is a born letter-writer, and born letter-writers are few and far between. There can be no intimate knowledge of the war without such books as hers.

THE UNCENSORED LETTERS OF A CANTEEN GIRL. New York: Henry Holt & Co.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

Sir Gilbert Parker has not written a full-length novel for several years, but is appearing with "No Defence," from the Lippincott Press. Working out the theme of a man's honor, which the world thinks he has lost, there are many startling scenes of war, mutiny, and love, and the stirring contests of wills and wits with never a dull line in the book. It is truly Parker at his best, and the publishers are confident will make a sensation on its appearance in September.

Frank M. Gregg, author of "The Founding of a Nation" (Doran), has purchased at Plymouth the ground on which the original Plymouth Colony was established. On this site he expects to erect and furnish a facsimile of the original Pilgrim Common House, and it is said that he then intends to turn the property over to the Federal government as a permanent memorial to the Landing of the Pilgrims.

In September the Czechoslovak Republic will commemorate its founding in a manner highly interesting to Americans. John Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln" is to be produced at Prague in Czech. Lincoln is becoming more and more widely accepted as a symbol standing for liberty. It is because of this and the intrinsic high quality of the young Englishman's work that his play has been selected. Mr. Drinkwater is leaving England for Prague to enjoy the performance.

Everett Dean Martin, author of "The Behavior of Crowds," which the Harpers will bring out this fall, has returned from Nantucket Island with the completely corrected proofs of his new book, as an evidence of a serious side to his summering.

Stopford Brooke's last critical work, "Naturalism in English Poetry," a scholarly and comprehensive study of an important phase of English literature, is announced for early publication by E. P. Dutton & Co.

Authorship is looking up financially. The latest evidence comes from a list recently submitted to Congress showing the vocations of persons having the largest incomes in the United States prior to 1918. Out of fifteen authors, editors, and reporters one earned $500,000, one $300,000, one $250,000, two $200,000, and eight $100,000. It is to be hoped that the word "earned" is not used in the equivocal sense of "acquired," as explained in the story of the rich editor who, after the proverbial poverty-stricken boyhood and youth, retired with a comfortable fortune of $50,000. The account goes on to say that "this money was acquired through industry, economy, conscientious effort to give full value, indomitable perseverance, and the death of an uncle, who left the editor $49,999.50."

Sumatra in 1918 imported 886,835 pounds of "second-hand" American newspapers. The equator runs through the island and the papers are used as parasols for tender rubber and sugar cane shoots.

"MAMMA'S AFFAIR."

The piece at the Curran is a Harvard prize comedy; which means, no doubt, that it was written as a result of the activities of the Harvard Workshop, that dramatic organization at Harvard the members of which study and encourage the art of the drama under the now well-nigh famous leadership of Professor George P. Baker. I suppose we may assume that "Mamma's Affair" is one of the prize plays in the regular autumnal competition for long plays instituted by this same "Workshop." "Mamma's Affair" is by Rachel Barton Butler—presumably one of the Radcliffe students, since it is they who attend to the feminine rôle of the Harvard organization. It is a very neatly turned and amusing comedy, dealing with the calamitous results of a hypochondriac's selfish absorption of her young daughter's time, strength, and affectionate solicitude. The author has recognized shrewdly that hypochondriasis goes with the dramatic temperament. The self-styled invalid fairly revels in saintly sweetness, patience, resignation, gratitude—all faked. She is always traveling, for she needs fresh audiences and new and more complaisant physicians. Attended by a sympathetic and congenial friend who is the possessor of a son of marriageable age, the pseudo invalid revels in her rôle, and the unfortunate eighteen-year-old daughter, whose conscience is many hundreds per cent. bigger than her age, becomes enmeshed in an engagement. The son is a what-is-it, but the two mothers overlook that, for they have vast stores of sentimental emotionalism with which to amuse themselves, and work up occasional breezes of excitement in their mature existences. This is the situation, and the author proceeds to make things hum by evoking a physician who reads in the white face of little eighteen-years that a crisis is near. "Mamma's Affair" is a comedy, and a very amusing one, but when sweet little eighteen had her first attack of hysteria it was so much like the real thing that we became temporarily grave and sympathetic, for the author had worked matters up to such a pitch that even in the midst of the laughter we perceived the unnecessary sacrifice of a healthy young existence.

The doctor turns out to be the lifeboat, and bears down to the rescue with such impetus that in the second act we see the lily of the first act transformed to a pale pink rose, nodding in the summer breezes of rest and care, and breathing forth fragrant perfumes of young delight in mere living.

This happy result was attained by the unnatural physician separating the daughter from that wad of absorbent cotton, her mother. Also from her future husband whom she doesn't love; also from that near-tragedy queen, her future mother-in-law. Sweet Eighteen, however, has a hearty, wholesome nurse who loves laughter and common sense; and the doctor calls daily. Thus the germ of romance, real romance, develops.

One of the merits of the piece is that it is founded on just such situations as exist all around us. Sometimes the victim is a mother, sometimes a daughter, sometimes a wife; rarely a husband. It is the feminine temperament that is more apt to dramatize, to romanticize sickness; why, heaven only knows. Men novel-writers used to, but they do so no more. For sickness is ugly; it not only looks bad, but it sometimes smells bad. Besides, it presupposes germs, and germs are something whose society we do not cultivate. Why, then, do some orders of the female mind believe that there is anything intrinsically picturesque or interesting or even creditable in the invalid state? Why indeed?

If they study the countenances of their friends while they reel off ailments or symptoms they may find there perfunctory sympathy, but little real interest. As to whether or not a person is really ill people always are interested in the basic fact, because such a state has consequences; consequences that might, remotely or otherwise, affect them. No, a sick person reveling in his or her state is not only a whitened sepulchre, but a bore. The real invalid, feeling a mighty yearning to be physically normal, often suppresses the tale of woe and turns thankfully to the affairs of others. And when the sick become most interesting it is by exercising heroic self-control and making such efforts to minimize their discomfort or suffering that they reach a certain height of moral dignity which inspires respect.

Interesting and entertaining though the play is, the company is equally so. They call it an all-star cast, and they have certainly assembled a group of well-known and well-liked players. Robert Edson, Effie Shannon, Amelia Bingham—all three have starred many times. Ida St. Leon—is she not the girl associated with the great success of "Polly of the Circus"?—Katherine Kaired is a stranger to us, but she is an expert in her line, and the midget playing Buttons, whose name is given as Little Billy, is a remarkably shrewd and sure player.

Altogether a very interesting group. I heard of a comment made by one of the local stage directors to the effect that no energetic, ambitious player in town could afford to stay away from a performance in which is demonstrated such a general and fine mastery of stage technic. As a result of the fine quality of the group of players the team-work is admirable. None of the players, prominent though each is individually, attempts, as far as I could see, to grab more of the stage centre than he is justly entitled to. The performance goes on oiled wheels, the comedy is delightfully conveyed, and just a touch of refined burlesque, done with artistic finish by Mesdames Shannon and Kaired, the two mature sentimentalists of the piece, and by George Le Guere, who plays the what-is-it, made the comedy scenes with the invalid quite irresistible.

Two-Fold Protection

The property-owner who pays for the water used by his tenants has two-fold protection against bills made excessive by leakage.

He is protected, first, by his tenants; second, by our Service Department.

Most tenants dislike water waste. When the faucet or the toilet leaks, they usually notify the property-owner.

With this cooperation from a careful tenant, the property-owner is in a position to have the fixtures made tight before the leakage has lasted long enough to affect the bill.

In the rare cases where the tenant is negligent, and in the rather frequent cases where the tenant does not realize that there is leakage, our Service Department acts without charge as a second line of protection.

When the monthly meter reading indicates abnormal delivery of water, our Service Department notifies the property-owner that he had better have the fixtures inspected.

It is not unusual, in such cases, for the landlord to get "a bit huffy" with his tenants, and to complain that they should have notified him of the leakage.

But it usually develops that the waste of water is due to a "blind leak" or to a defect in the toilet not readily observed.

Doubly protected as he is—by his tenants and by our Service Department—the property-owner should have no cause to complain that he is paying for water wasted by leakage.

other group consisting of the doctor, the nurse, and the young real invalid showed a delightful genuineness, and, on the part of the doctor and the invaluable nurse, much homely common sense allied to mother wit.

Amelia Bingham was the nurse, and made of that invaluable aid a shrewd, cheerful counselor to a very perplexed friend; for the playwright had the happy conception of indicating the coziest, most trusting, most deep-seated amity between these two tried and tested friends and incorrigible lovers of the ninthlest.

We have seen Amelia Bingham in the past in showy Clyde Fitch roles, some of them romantic; but never was she better placed than in the part of the good-hearted nurse who has an irresistible itch to set the stray pawns straight on the checkerboard of life. Particularly does she shine in her cleverness in colloquial shadings.

Robert Edeson is an actor upon whose countenance is deeply stamped the mark of his profession. You couldn't possibly mistake him for anything else but an actor. That means, I should judge, that he is as much an actor by training as by instinct. Those flexible facial muscles have done their work with conscience and thoroughness, if not always with enthusiasm. There is, it seems to me, generally a slightly heightened flavor to Mr. Edeson's comedy, satisfying though it is. As, for instance, why did he say good-night—or good-day—in something of a hurled tone at the end of the doctor's first visit? An actor so trained and experienced must have had his reason, but I didn't get it.

That, by the way, must be one of the thorns of the profession—the failure of those of us in front always to appreciate the meaning and intention of small effects carefully thought out by the players.

Ida St. Leon, with her youthful countenance, her tip-tilted nose, and her rather flat but nevertheless wholly expressive little voice, is quite a fetching little thingums and fully succeeded in persuading the audience into complete sympathy with the mature doctor's final intention to pluck this charming spring blossom. Miss St. Leon is an expert mistress of the technic of the stage, and was admirable in conveying the over-conscientious cares of the daughter and the perfunctory reception of poor, dutiful little Sweet Eighteen to the unwelcome ardors of a freak lover.

Miss Shannon played the hypochondriac perfectly; her studiously gentle resignation, the abstraction with which she surveyed the pale countenance of the sweet young ministrant as compared to the joy that lighted her own when a drug to be administered in periodic installments was prescribed; and always interestingly graceful and elegant in manner and pose, in conformity with the idea of making invalidism a touching and appealing drama.

The author, being a woman, fairly showered damns all over the place. All the likable or lovable people in the play got in a damn or so before the play was over; even pretty little Eve; although hers was a quotation, given with that relish felt by all women who have begun to violate the decree prohibiting feminine damns.

ANOTHER MAUDE FULTON PLAY.

But not a good one; alas, no! I went expectantly to see "Enter Mary Jones" because "The Humming Bird" was so well played and acted, but it struck me as a play drawn tentatively from a closet shelf and put on to take advantage of "The Humming Bird" success, and because it was hoped socialism might be a timely topic. But the socialistic ideas didn't convey, and neither did the rest of it. The play begins mildly well, rapidly shows a lack of complete preparation for public representation, and trails off into dullness.

It begins with a "damn," and I rather imagine the average spectator ends with one. Why did she put it on? And what ill-luck took my steps there? How much more agreeable it is to praise than to condemn.

"The Humming Bird" is evidently off on the road, for a new lot of players are in this piece; rather bright young people, although not particularly experienced, except Lucille Webster and Frank W. Wallace, who do good work. But it was a tactical error to go to the expense of putting on this piece after the good effect produced by the clever, well-written, sympathetically motivated, and rather original "Humming Bird."

"39 EAST."

This play of Rachel Crothers' is one which requires a character actor for nearly every rôle. Her central idea is a good one for entertaining purposes, recalling an old play called "The Boarding House." I think, in which the audience is permitted to see the assembling of the boarders at the breakfast-table.

It was, however, rather a heavy task for the Alcazar company, "39 East" being the kind of play that relies on finished acting to give a brilliant effect to what, on the whole, is light and ephemeral.

The Alcazar company attacked their task with their customary conscientiousness, although not entirely with the usual results, and the audience got a fair proportion of fun out of the performance.

THE MAITLAND THEATRE,

"The Devil's Disciple" is the vehicle used in this opening week of the fall season; that play that, originally written for Richard Mansfield, now stands on its own merits, quite unlinked with Mansfield's fame, as a remarkable example of serious travesty.

Shaw was satirizing melodrama, but in doing it he still contrived to minister to that naive side of us which incorrigibly loves melodrama and to the satiric side which chuckles to see it brilliantly travestied.

The result is a play that appeals to diverse intelligences, and which is, in its dual capacity, not too easy to act.

How the company at the Maitland came through I am unable to state, having found it expedient in a very full week to squeeze in portions of several performances. I thus saw only the first act of the play, which is so splendidly actable that the drama and the real human nature of it was strongly responded to immediately, although the act is a mere introduction to what follows.

Maitland expressed the sort of sardonic railery and careless good will of Dick with sufficient dash and reckless levity to greatly pique the interest, and I left at the end of a brilliant first act in which is displayed the promising perspective of the Dudgeons' family relations with considerable regret.

The patrons of the playhouse rallied in considerable numbers on this opening night, and flowers handed over the footlights testified to the warmth of the welcome offered by the patrons of the Maitland Playhouse.

The Curran Theatre.

After twelve consecutive months in the Selwyn Theatre, New York, "Buddies" will be the attraction here at the Curran Theatre beginning tomorrow night, with matinees Wednesday and Saturday.

While "Buddies" is not, strictly speaking, a musical comedy, it may be accurately described as a comedy with music, which merely means that the artistic unities of the plot are not destroyed by irrelevant songs every few minutes. The scene of "Buddies" is Brittany; its heroine a peasant maid and the hero an American soldier billeted in her house just after the signing of the armistice. Julie's problems spring from the excruciating shyness of her soldier lover, which proves apparently an insurmountable barrier to the declaration of his intentions and the machinations of the dyed-in-the-wool villain, who is intent upon ruining the good name of Julie's brother (who has given his life for France) unless she will marry him. More as an interpolation of the beautiful story than as an irrelevant composition Mr. Hilliam has written his delightfully melodious score, and both story and music will be interpreted here by the same inimitable company of players which won the heart of New York for twelve unbroken months.

The final performance of "Mamma's Affair" will be this evening.

The Columbia Theatre.

The change that has been wrought in theatricals in the past quarter of a century is nowhere better exemplified than in the cost of the productions. Especially is this true of a big extravaganza such as the Marcus Show of 1920, which opens an engagement of two weeks at the Columbia next Monday night.

One hundred thousand dollars in cash was spent in scenery, wardrobe, and electrical effects before the curtain went up for the first time in the East a few weeks ago. Two-thirds of this sum was expended on costumes alone. Over a thousand garments of age worn by the feminine members in the two acts, twenty-three scenes, and twenty-seven musical numbers.

Bee Winsome, the dainty ingénue of demure and graceful mien, wears some of the most stunning creations. The gown and headgear which she displays in "Promenade d'Introduction" is a magnificent example of the modiste's art. Then there is her hand-painted orchid frock.

The Marcus Peaches are adorned with a series of bizarre hiliments ranging from the all-enveloping, rich jewel gowns in the first act to the "shadow dresses" of "Birth of Venus."

The Alcazar Theatre.

The fun-making "Parlor, Bedroom and Bath" at the Alcazar will be followed next Sunday matinee by a week's farewell revival of "Daddies," the David Belasco success that created a sensation a fortnight ago. It had to be withdrawn temporarily while crowds were being turned away reluctant and its restoration will afford universal satisfaction. The delicious humor and gentle pathos of this comedy about the little foreign war waifs who brought anxieties and joys to the club of bachelors who foster-fathered them provide delightful entertainment to all ages and conditions. The ideal cast remains unchanged, including Dudley Ayres, Inez Ragan, Rafael Brunetto, Brady Kline, Ben Erway, Al Cunningham, Frederic Green, Emily Pinter, Helen MacKerricher, Mlle. Valentina Zimina, and Talma-Yetta Wilbur, with the wonderful group of child players, Sylvia Yaffe, Phyllis Chatterly, and the Wynn triplets.

To follow comes the mystery melodrama "At 9:45," by Owen Davis, that was a New York sensation last season when produced for a long period by William A. Brady at the Playhouse.

The Orpheum.

Two talented purveyors of operatic music form one of the headline acts at the Orpheum next week, opening with the Sunday matinee. They are Marie and Mary McFarland. Both were among the first from the operatic stage to enter vaudeville and both constantly have flitted back and forth between the two-day and the greater operatic companies of this country.

"Frenzied Finance" forms the basis for Frank Wilcox's brilliant comedy, "Ssh-h!" the other Orpheum headliner. Mr. Wilcox is proclaimed in advance as a highly talented actor.

The Primrose Four, one of the best-known singing organizations in vaudeville, is to be another new Orpheum attraction. William Brack and his company of eccentrics will be enjoyed, it is said, for they mingle clever showmanship with their exhibition of strength and agility.

Wallace Galvin with a highly perfected egg trick and Coley and Jaxon, who depict "the minstrel and the maid," are others declared to be above standard. Elly, the young girl juggler, completes the new vaudeville offering. "Under the Apple Tree," the extravagant musical comedy, one of this week's hits, is the one holdover. Topics of the Day, International News, and the Orpheum orchestra are due to begin and close the show.

VANITY FAIR.

One would suppose that we had already troubles enough, but Mrs. Asquith seems to be dissatisfied with the standing crop and anxious to enlarge it. She tells us in her memoirs that the women of today are not so beautiful as those of the last generation and that the stage is empty alike of great men and of lovely women. Of course we chatter as much as we ever did about our supposed excellences, but as a matter of fact we are living in an age of pygmies, of men who are small and mean, and of women who are facially inferior. We should like to write a few large hooks on this topic, and particularly on the decadence of men. We have some theories on these matters, but they must wait.

Now Mrs. Asquith is fairly safe in thus making her comparisons, because we do not know much about the beauty of women of other generations. It is true we have their alleged portraits, but they count for little or nothing. In the case of a painting we are wholly at the mercy of the artist, who usually paints what he sees within rather than what he sees without. And the camera is hardly more truthful. Nearly every one looks beautiful sometimes. A clever pose, a skillful arrangement of lights and shades, a quick capture of the passing mood, will do wonders for most of us. The truthful photographer would be bankrupt in a week. Indeed he would be lucky to escape with his life. We may doubt if true portraiture is essentially a matter of the face at all, although the face must be its basis. A portrait is a presentation of a state of mind, and it is for the artist to select the state of mind that he wishes to portray. It is not that a face is beautiful, but rather that it possesses beauty. And the same may be said of landscapes, for these also portray states of mind.

It may be noticed that when Mrs. Asquith talks about the beauty of the women of today or of any other day she refers to a very small group of women, to the women who by birth or attainments have attracted the attention of the world. She must necessarily do this in speaking of the women of the past because we know absolutely nothing about those other women who never won their way into that charmed and select circle. For example, she mentions three or four women of the past whose beauty, she says, was incomparable. One of them was a celebrated actress and the others were titled aristocrats. If she were to select a corresponding number of the beauties of today for purposes of comparison it would be found that they, too, were aristocrats or actresses. In other words she is comparing two very small groups of women, and to the exclusion of the great masses of unnoticed women throughout the world. Now it may be that the actresses and aristocrats of today are not so beautiful as the actresses and aristocrats of forty years ago. We can not say. Forty years ago we had not reached the age of discrimination in such matters. Indeed it seems to us that we were beginning to sit up and take notice. Circumstances into which it would be painful to enter have prohibited any close study of the actresses and aristocrats of today.

None the less we are not wholly without opinions in this matter. Every now and then it has been our lot to glance at the portraits of beautiful women that are sometimes assembled in the Sunday supplements of our newspapers. It will be noticed that these portraits, almost without exception, are those of celebrities either of the drama or of the dollar. We are doing just as they did forty years ago, making our choice from a very narrow circle and assuming that our choice is representative of women in general. Now it is quite certain that aristocratic women and rich women are not more beautiful than others except in so far as their wealth may be an aid to the toilet. Our natural toadyism may incline us to believe that they are more beautiful, but we know better. A certain assumption of beauty may be attached to the actress because beauty to some extent is her stock in trade, but even that is much overrated. But the fact remains that our selection of beauty is made almost entirely from these classes, and always has been, and therefore it has no value at all. Let us suppose that one woman in a thousand may be described as actually beautiful. Let us suppose, furthermore, that there are three thousand actresses, aristocrats, and rich women to whom we are restricted by sycophancy for our selection. That would give us three really beautiful women. Now it is obvious that if we fill a newspaper page with twelve or twenty portraits, instead of three, that must be selected from the three thousand we shall have to include many women who are not beautiful at all, and the average of beauty must sink correspondingly. Therefore these beauty parades have no value whatever. It may be that we can find an actress of today who is more beautiful than Mrs. Langtry in her prime. Perhaps we can find the wife of some millionaire or of some duke who is less beautiful than the wife of some other millionaire or duke half a century ago. But what of it? Does that prove that the women of today are not so beautiful as the women of the last generation? Not a bit of it.

As a matter of fact the little circle from which we select our beauties is not particularly favored of nature in respect to good looks. It is rather the other way. Neither the life of the stage nor of the hothouse—whatever that may be—is peculiarly conducive to good looks. Heaven forbid that we should treat this matter frivolously. Heaven still more forbid that we should pretend to a personal experience that has not been our lot either from fortune or from opportunity. But it seems to us that if we were searching for real beauties we should go neither to the drama nor to the dollar to find them. Take them by and large they are a disappointing lot. We should be inclined to take a rapid survey of the department stores to begin with, and we have a strong suspicion that we should not have to go any further than that. Why we know a girl at Petaluma—but there. Never mind about the girl at Petaluma. Let us patronize local industries and our own home town. And so we will undertake to say that we can find more pretty women in the department stores of San Francisco than among all the millionaires' wives and daughters of the country, and if we should unexpectedly find ourselves short of one or two we can run over to Oakland and make good the lack in about ten minutes. And with sufficient encouragement we are prepared to do it. With a vaguely reminiscent eye we see that gallery pass in front of us. It contains some two or three stars far and away more lovely than any actress now upon the stage and who counts that day lost that does not see her picture in the newspapers, far and away more lovely than eight out of ten of those aristocratic beauties who are invariably fetched forth as representatives and as types.

So we need not take Mrs. Asquith too seriously. We may even suspect that it was her intention to make trouble.

The original "tree of knowledge" in the Garden of Eden, reputed by tradition to have been the one from which the serpent tempted Eve, has literally fallen a victim to the ambition of some British Tommies on a furlough to have themselves photographed in its branches, a dispatch says. Their weight proved too much for it, and the tree crashed to the ground. A British court of inquiry has decided that the Moslems be awarded $1750 to build a mosque on the spot.

One and two-month furloughs are being offered for reenlistments in the United States army.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

The meeting was interrupted by the entrance of one who made his way to the platform and whispered excitedly to the chairman. "Is Mr. Smith in the audience?" broke forth the presiding officer. "I am informed that his house is afire." Forty men sprang to their feet. "It is the house of Mr. John Smith," added the chairman. "Thank goodness!" fervently exclaimed one man, resuming his seat.

Sandy, the farmer, had been staying with some friends for about a month, and while he and his host were out for a walk one day they called at a wayside inn for a drink. As his host was about to pay for it Sandy stopped him. "Na, na," he said, "I'll not allow it. Ye've been keeping me in everything at yer house for a month, and ye've treated me to the theatre, and cab fares, and paid for all the drinks. I tell ye, I'll hae na mair of it. We'll toss for this one."

A Boston mother was much exercised when she discovered that her carefully-reared Reginald had struck up an acquaintance with some Italian laborers and had actually lunched with them. This fearful news was communicated to her by a friend witnessing the awful sight, and when Reginald arrived home mother was waiting for him. He indignantly denied the allegations brought against him. "I didn't eat any luncheon with any strange men," he said. "Those men are all my friends. And I didn't eat any meat cooked on a shovel." "What did you eat, then?" "Only some gravy cooked in a shovel by one of the men. But it was clean, all right, mother, for I saw the man wipe off the shovel with his hat before he poured in the gravy."

Leonard was interested in rabbits. So much so that his family gave him a pair and let him "go into the business." When the baby bunnies arrived excitement filled the neighborhood. The father of one of Leonard's chums kept several hives of bees which were ever a source of curiosity to the boys. "Watcha goin' to name 'em?" enthusiastically demanded the chum of the proud possessor of the baby rabbits. "Huh, what did you name all your bees?"

There is a story told concerning a careful mother whose three children horrified her one day by producing for her inspection three exceedingly hilarious-looking toffee apples. "They are very pretty, my dears," she lied bravely. "But really you mustn't eat them. I've heard of little children dying through eating colored toffee apples." Then she took the sweetmeats away and put them out of reach—as she thought—on a shelf in her dressing-room. She imagined that would do the trick; but early next morning she heard a sound out on the landing, and, going to see who was astir so early, found Elsie trotting along the passage. "Where are you going, dear?" she asked. "It's not 6 o'clock yet." "Going to see if Dick and Arthur are dead yet," replied the eight-year-old miss. "I'm not."

THE MERRY MUSE.

The New Terror.

No longer darlings of a dream,
Behold our babes and sucklings
Betake them to the inky stream
Like eager callow ducklings.

As soon as weaning-time is past,
Still immature in diction,
The wide-eyed wonder hastens fast
To specialize in fiction.

It takes the soother from its lips,
Dictating with a dawdle,
Or with uncertain fingers dips
Its pen in ink and caudle.

Our infants, infantine no more,
As authors have expanded,
And candy-sucking kiddies pour
Confessions that are candid.

They lisp in numbers to excess—
The numbers are appalling!
Hearing the sirens of the Press
Instead of angels calling.

—Arthur L. Salmon in Judge.

The Personal Note.

The personal in literature has always made a hit,
O'er Shakespeare's poaching days the student gloats,
The hoi polloi absorb the Browning letters bit by bit,
They like to read of Goldsmith's gaudy coats.

We sit up nights to learn the things that Shelley liked for lunch,
To know De Quincey's habits doesn't hurt,
While Robert Burns' poems may possess an added punch
Because we've heard that Bobby was a flirt.

Once Walter Savage Landor through a window hurled a boy,
And what that poet subsequently said
Has been unto posterity a never-failing joy:
"My God! I never thought—the violet bed!"

It's nice to know Macaulay took a page in at a glance,

That Wordsworth walked bareheaded in the rain,
That Jonson sometimes tweaked off ladies' slippers at a dance,
That Coleridge was lost without a cane.

But did these literary lights whose works adorn our shelves
(Attend, ye scribblers who spill this Ego rot!)
Indite a single sentence of this stuff about themselves?

A loud reply from Echo: "They did not!"
—Baird Leonard in Philadelphia Public Ledger.

Amazon Explorer's Costume.

When Dr. William C. Farahee of the University of Pennsylvania goes to the wilds of South America for specimens for the University of Pennsylvania Museum he has to hack his way through jungles infested with swarms of stinging, disease-dealing insects, and to protect himself from these attacks he has a special rig. The natives go naked in the forests and do not seem to mind greatly the pests that light upon them. They are probably sting-proof, but the white man is not. Dr. Farahee says that insects more than panthers or snakes make life unbearable along the Amazon in its wilder reaches.

The protective costume makes Dr. Farahee look like a strange creature indeed. Thick, closely-knit gloves with cuffs of canvas and netting reaching to his shoulders are of equal importance with a helmet of canvas draped with something that hangs over his head, neck, and shoulders. These coverings are supplemented by the labors of two negro boys who fan and hrush away gnats and mosquitos. There are, Dr. Farahee says, no satisfactory hoots to be had for such work, certainly no waterproof ones. So he wears porous hoots with heavy soles; thus the water, which gets in whatever the precautions, can get out as quickly as possible. The insects bite low down about the body, as well as attacking the head, neck, and arms. In an endeavor to thwart them Dr. Farahee drapes his legs to the knees with double thicknesses of mosquito netting. This gets slimy from the morasses and clings to him. Then insects bite through it and it must be changed, frequently more than once in a day's tramp.

Vote "No" on Proposition No. 2 ARGUMENT AGAINST
HARRIS STATE PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT ACT

PROPOSITION NO. 2 ON THE NOVEMBER BALLOT

Proposition No. 2 (the Harris State Prohibition Enforcement Act), does not represent true California sentiment. The measure itself is the product of the last Legislature, which absolutely misrepresented the majority wish of the people of this State on the question of prohibition.

In 1914, 1916 and 1918 California voted down prohibition by very decisive majorities. Within sixty days after the people had rejected the third attempt of the prohibitionists, a Legislature dominated by radical "drys" performed the startling feat of placing this State in the prohibition column by ratifying the Eighteenth Amendment and passing the Harris Act in California by way of enforcement.

In the rush to take advantage of a favorable Legislature, upon the personnel of which the prohibition element had worked at the preceding election, the Harris bill was devised and adopted eight months before the Volstead National Enforcement Act was passed by Congress.

The grape-growing interests of California availed themselves of the right of referendum and promptly presented a widely-signed petition to the Secretary of State. This brings the question of prohibition again before the voters.

Men and women who believe in democracy in government should unhesitatingly vote "NO" on Proposition No. 2. In the annals of political history in this State, there is no more glaring perversion of the law of justice or thwarting of the will of the people than was exemplified in the passing of this particular State measure. Even a prohibitionist who would profess to love justice, would vote down this legislation with conscience clear. The conservative reasoning voter really has no other course to pursue if he analyzes the facts.

Let it be explained further that this Act would foist on this State a bone-dry prohibition law from which the people of California could get no relief even if Congress in its judgment later on saw fit to modify the Volstead Act by permitting the use of light wines and beers in the home. If Proposition No. 2 becomes the law in our State, we would find ourselves under rigid radical prohibition while other States in the Union could enjoy any modifications that might come through Congress by amendment of the Volstead Act. This would make a laughing stock of California which produces ninety per cent. of all the grapes grown in the United States.

Proposition No. 2, being of premature birth, is unnecessary legislation. If it becomes the law, it compels those who purchase liquor for non-beverage purposes, to obtain double sets of permits—one from the United States Prohibition Enforcement Department and another from the California State Board of Pharmacy.

I trust the great majority of voters of this State will mark "X" opposite the word "NO" on this measure and thereby again defeat prohibition in California for the fourth time. I repeat that the proposed law is superfluous, would bar light wines and beer in the home, and does not reflect the true sentiment of our glorious hospitable California.

(Signed) E. M. SHEEHAN,
President California Grape Growers' Exchange.

The Late William H. Taylor

Died, in San Francisco on Tuesday, William H. Taylor, the second son of the late Captain W. H. Taylor.

Mr. Taylor was a gentle, kindly man of a retiring nature, not seen much in San Francisco the past few years, making his home in Menlo Park. Twenty-five years ago he was our champion tennis player and held that title for years.

Handsome, talented, a great reader, and of the highest integrity, Mr. Taylor is mourned by a large circle of friends. T. B. September 15, 1920.

Scotti Opera Company.

G. Albert Lansburgh, architect and acoustic expert, is in charge of the building of the special stage for the engagement of the Scotti Grand Opera Company. Mr. Lansburgh promises that the merest sigh in Mimi's "Si mi chiamano Mimi" or the faintest sob in Canio's "Lament" will be distinctly heard in every nook and corner of the Auditorium. Mr. Lansburgh has so arranged as to bring the artists and the audience into the closest intimacy.

Scotti and his wonderful company left New York last Saturday night and are now en route to California, playing the most important cities. He is carrying eleven expert stage mechanics from the Metropolitan, and to be sure that he will get the lighting effects he desires he carries a special switchboard.

Tickets are on sale now at Sherman, Clay & Co's.

Two weeks hence, at the Columbia Theatre, San Francisco will see for the first time the new play, "The Acquittal." This is the successful drama by Rita Weiman, whom readers will recall as the author of some good stories in the Saturday Evening Post.

COLLEGE FRANCAIS—A San Francisco Institution.

The students of languages will be interested to hear of this interesting institution, Le College Francais, founded in 1918, under the auspices of the French government.

Dr. Gontard, who organized the college, having left for France, where he expects to stay definitely, Miss Marie Louise Boutin, professor of the Alliance Francaise, has taken the direction of the school.

The aim of the college is similar to that of l'Alliance Francaise, to spread the knowledge of French, to give to the people of San Francisco the same opportunities that Americans obtain when they attend the schools of Paris. To learn the language, customs, ideas, and ideals of France.

The new Directress is well known in San Francisco, where as a professor of l'Alliance Francaise she organized the adult classes. She possesses the degree of B. L. and M. L. from the University of California, where she completed her English studies.

Miss Boutin has also written a considerable number of plays, short stories, and poems, in French and in English, many of which have been published in France and in this country.

One of the interesting things about the method used in the College Francais is that no other language but the language studied is spoken from the beginning. The result is that students understand French, Spanish, or Italian in a remarkably short time.

The college is situated in Rooms 336, 335 Russ Building, 235 Montgomery Street. Phone Sutter 4717.—Adv.

29 GEARY ST. SAN FRANCISCO

American Academy in Rome.

The fête to be given on the evening of the 17th (Friday night) at the home of the Harry Stetsons at Burlingame is the first opportunity San Francisco has had to exhibit a vital interest in the American Academy in Rome. Up to now this institution has been supported almost wholly by New York and Boston, although, in truth, it means as much, and possibly even more, for the West and the Pacific Coast than for the East. Here we have in the making much that may be influenced artistically by the Academy; and we ought both to realize the fact and to contribute our aid. And just now aid is very much needed to the end of lifting what remains of a debt that has hung a heavy weight for the Academy to carry. Artistically speaking, San Francisco has a unique repute. It is not an unworthy boast that here, in measures not equaled by any other city in the Western half of the continent, the interests of art find respect and promotion; and it should be a privilege to sustain and promote that which has given to San Francisco a special standing in the world of artistic interests.

In the programme arranged for Friday evening the effort has been to have each number worthy of the cause and worthy of the community. Mr. Harry Robertson will sing in costume songs of the Italian Contadina, Miss Elinor True, a former student at Denishawn, will give dances of India. Another number will be a "tableau vivant" representing the Court of Versailles holding festival in the palace gardens. This number will be used as an introduction to Ernest Dowson's "Pierrot," which will be played by William Rainey and Miss Marie Louise Myers of the Players Club. Last, but not least, will be "La Estrallita" in Spanish dances.

The promoters of the fête especially appreciate the part to be taken in the fête by the Players Club of San Francisco. Members of the club have taken the matter seriously, have given much study and pains, and the club has given the services of their two best members.

With favorable weather—and the weather can hardly fail to be favorable at this season—the fête should be a notable success artistically, and the advance booking assures its success socially and financially.

Symphony Orchestra.

While the majority of the members of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra have been reengaged for the coming season, the personnel has been slightly modified by sixteen changes among the players. E. J. Rossett, a former member of the organization, returns to the first violin section, which will contain as a new member W. Czarny, who comes direct from the Warsaw Symphony. Among the second violins the newcomers are H. H. Hoffman, who played there two years ago, and Hubert Dunn.

Emil Hahl, who played at the first viola stand of the Philadelphia Symphony for seventeen years, will occupy the same position here, and in this section there will be two new men—August Triebel from the Minneapolis Symphony and F. Dierich of New York. Two new players will be noted among the 'cellists—C. Hranek from the Minneapolis Symphony and Nino Marcelli of San Francisco. There are also two changes in the double basses, the new members being L. R. Cassetta and E. Schulze, both from the Minneapolis Symphony.

B. Emilio Puyans, who will depart soon for Cuba, will be replaced as first flutist by Anthony Linden, who has been filling this position with the Minneapolis Symphony. V. Schipillitti, who was first oboe with the Los Angeles Philharmonic last season, has returned to play the English horn. J. S. Wogelsang takes a place with the French horns. Leland S. Barton will play first trumpet, and Frederick W. Tait first trombone.

The first appearance of the orchestra will be on Saturday evening, October 2d, in the Exposition Auditorium, at a special pre-season concert.

All seats will be reserved for this concert, which is entirely separate from the regular series. The season ticket sale is now in progress, and the first concert will take place in the Curran Theatre on Friday afternoon, October 8th.

The Maitland Playhouse.

Tolstoy's powerful drama "Fedya," which will be recalled by followers of the theatre as having been played by John Barrymore under the title of "Redemption," will be presented for the first time on the Pacific Coast at the Maitland Playhouse this coming week, opening with subscribers' night, Monday, September 20th.

The Maitland Players, reinforced by many new faces, are meeting with great success this week in George Bernard Shaw's "The Devil's Disciple," that will close with the Saturday matinee and evening performances. Arthur Maitland took the leading rôle most capably as Richard Dudgeon, with Miss Betty Oliver, his leading lady, as Mrs. Anderson. These were the parts originated by Richard Mansfield and his wife.

Philip Ryder, who will be seen in leading rôles, was a most acceptable Anthony Anderson, and Caroline Howard gained applause as Mrs. Dudgeon.

The Maitland players are bard at work on the Tolstoy play, which promises to be one of the most interesting offerings of the week. There will be matinées Tuesday and Saturday, as usual.

In Beelochistan, when a physician gives a dose, he is expected to partake of a similar dose himself, as a guarantee of his good faith.

Table Talk

"We went to the aviation field last week. It was great sport."

"Yes, every time we met friends, Clarke insisted on taking an aeroplane trip with them."

"And Marion asked me how many times I had been up. I said 'six.' Then Marion said, 'Clarke, you come right home with me,' and I had to go."

"Clarke, have some more of this delicious coffee?"

Tuesday at Sacramento.

The several party gatherings at Sacramento on Tuesday went gravely through the motions devised and prescribed for such events—and that was about all there was to it. There was no very active interest in the proceedings either on the part of those present or of the public in general. The reason is not far to seek. Opinion in all parties and in all groups has become fixed in the idea that this is a Republican year. This being so, there is no point in getting excited either one way or the other. The Republican party doesn't need it and the Democratic party knows that it is in for a drubbing and has no wish to emphasize its discomfiture by a furious campaign. None of the speeches at Sacramento rose above the commonplace. Mr. Shortridge elaborated familiar doctrines. Governor Stephens gave an elaborate series of quotations from Senator Harding. Senator Johnson spoke in good temper, reserving his thunder-and-lightning for larger audiences. The most notable incident of the day, regarded seriously, was an outwardly cordial greeting on the Republican convention platform between Governor Stephens and Senator Johnson. The day was not without its contribution to the humors of politics. Only one man—J. W. Fortney, colored candidate for assemblyman from an Oakland district—was entitled under the law to "convene" in the name of the Progressive party. He went solemnly through the formal procedure, calling the convention to order, making a "key-note" speech, naming committees, adopting resolutions, condemning the Wilson administration, endorsing Sam Shortridge, paying his compliments to MacSweeney, and in the end not forgetting to designate himself as the state central committee of the Progressive party. From start to finish it was an unanimous procedure—in truth something of a love feast.

The Appointment of Miss Boardman.

Back of the appointment of Miss Mabel Boardman as a member of the board of commissioners for the District of Columbia there is an interesting story. Last winter a vacancy was created in the board by the resignation of one Gardner, a hard-headed, practical man who by some fluke had been appointed to a job where hard-headedness and practicability are important qualities. Gardner quit in disgust because he found he could do nothing in conjunction with associates so bent on reform in its theoretical phases as to make District government a farce. As successor to Gardner the President appointed a rattle-brained "social scientist" named Van Schaick, a former clergyman and school-master of the same autocratic type as the President himself. There was a storm of protests and Van Schaick was not confirmed by the Senate. Some six weeks ago one Brownlow, a newspaper writer and near-socialist who had been on the board since 1913, resigned to accept a job as city manager of Petersburg, Virginia, at a larger salary. This left the military member of the board, officially known as the "engineer commissioner," Colonel Kutz, alone at the head of the District government. Government was about to suspend practically, inasmuch as authorization for the expenditure of moneys must, under the law, come from the civilian commissioners, when the President was stirred into action.

Mr. Wilson found himself up against a difficult situation inasmuch as the appointment must be confirmed by the Senate, and the Senate just now is not in the mood to confirm appointments. The motives behind this condition date back to the winter of 1912-13, just prior to Mr. Wilson's first inauguration. At that time the Senate was Democratic, and in order to hold the field clear for the incoming President (Wilson) there was persistent refusal to confirm Taft's appointments to office. Now the Republican Senate is inclined to the same course. It has additional reason in the fact that many of the President's recent appointments have been socialists, scalawags, and persons otherwise unfit. Knowing these facts, the President—or those who act for him—is betraying even more than ordinary dilatoriness in making appointments, a notable case being that of the Shipping Board. For more than three months the new shipping act has been on the statute books. Its first requirement is the appointment of a board of seven members with certain specified qualifications. Up to date Mr. Wilson has made no appointment at all.

In naming Miss Boardman as a members of the District commission there was diplomacy—and a challenge to the Senate. Miss Boardman is a woman of mature years, of large wealth, of broad experience, and of high social position. She is a sister of Mrs. Murray Crane, and during the Taft administration was a large figure in affairs in Washington both social and political. Her affiliations are with the conservative element that was dominant during the administration of President Taft. In short Miss Boardman belongs to the feminine wing of the old guard. Her appointment is in effect a "dare" to the Republican Senate to deny confirmation.

Miss Boardman deserves something at the hands of this administration, for she has notoriously been treated shabbily by it. To her, more than to any other individual, is due credit for reorganizing, revitalizing, and making an effective instrument of the American Red Cross. It was she who first put the Red Cross on the sound financial basis upon which it stood when we entered the great war. The important feature of her plan of reorganization was a guarantee that every dollar contributed by the American public for Red Cross relief work should be expended for that work without any deduction for overhead. It was through her efforts that a great endowment was built up and placed in a permanent and irreducible fund, the earnings of which were sufficient to pay more than ordinary running expenses. Under her plan the Treasury Department was made custodian of this fund, and expenditures of Red Cross money were audited by official experts.

With our entrance into the war the Administration, in a manner not yet made clear, eliminated Miss Boardman from her position of authority and responsibility in the Red Cross and installed in her place the President's brother-in-law, Professor Stockton Axson. Professor Axson, as secretary of the organization, put the financial affairs of the Red Cross into the hands of Henry P. Davison of J. P. Morgan & Co. Incidentally, when John Stockton Williams made his assault on the Riggs National Bank one of his first acts was to withdraw the Red Cross balances from Riggs and deposit them in a bank more friendly to the Administration. The whole financial structure was made over, an overhead organization which many critics believe to have been top-heavy was built up, the basic principle of taking care of the overhead from the earnings of the permanent endowment was disregarded. There are no available reports that give a definite idea as to what proportion of the vast sums contributed by the American public was spent for overhead and what proportion actually went into relief work. Miss Boardman, while not literally thrown out of the Red Cross organization, was reduced to a minor place in its official roster and to a relatively non-authoritative part in its activities.

Now Miss Boardman is honored by an appointment as one of the three virtual governors of the District of Columbia at a salary of $5000 per year. To fill the second vacancy on the commission the President has named J. Thilman Hendrick, an insurance agent and broker of Washington, about whom nothing is generally known excepting that he is registered as having been born in Tennessee in 1876, as having lived in Washington since 1894, and as a Democrat and a Presbyterian. The understanding is that he is slated by executive preference as the president of the board.

If the nomination of Hendrick had alone been made it is possible that the Senate, under the policy of not confirming partisan appointments at this time, might have rejected it. But under the circumstances both Hendrick and Miss Boardman will probably be confirmed. The need for reconstructing the board is imperative. The confirmation of Miss Boardman is an assurance, and in all likelihood it will carry Hendrick safely through the gauntlet of the Senate.

Mr. Harding and Mr. Roosevelt.

Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt's boast that as an official of the American Navy Department he had written the constitution of Haiti was an exercise of boyish vanity meriting rebuke, none the less Mr. Harding would have done better to leave it unnoticed and to hold to the general high level of his campaign utterances. That the public is not interested in what the candidates think of each other, and that it promptly discredits all personal reflections, is abundantly illustrated in the failure of Mr. Cox to impress the country with his charges in the matter of the Republican campaign funds.

We fear that in pausing to reply to Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Harding has involved himself in commitments that may embarrass him later on. For by whatever arts facts may be glossed over it remains that we hold and must continue to hold certain responsibilities with certain of our Latin-American neighbors that may from time to time call for activities on the part of our government quite as incongruous in theory as that of Mr. Roosevelt in the case of Haiti. Whether it fits into our theory or not, whether we would have it so or not, the world holds us responsible for the conduct of a group of countries which lie south of the Rio Grande and the Gulf of Mexico and north of the Isthmus. In the mind of Europe, whatever problems are connected with this group are marked off as attaching to us. "Mexico," remarked a famous European diplomat to the editor of the Argonaut at the peace conference last year. "—Oh, that's the States!" Whether it fits into our ideas or not, whether we would have it so or not, broadly speaking, we are held accountable throughout the world, not only for Mexico, but clear down the line of quasi-nationalities that lie beyond.

These countries are potentially of great value. Through conditions of climate, soil, and varied elevations, they yield products essential in the modern life of the world, products which may not be gotten elsewhere. Under pressure of universal demand for their products, they are far more developed industrially than politically. Events are always proving their practical incapability at the point of what Mr. Wilson has nominated "self-determination." In practice self-determination in the Central American zone means the rule of one selfish group of cormorants after another. It further means a multitude of evils that are ever crying aloud for suppression—exploitation and practical enslavement of the lower classes, arrogance and unmeasured selfishness on the part of property interests, tyranny and remorseless greed in the political sphere. It is in the nature of things that governments resting upon no basis of legality or equity inspired by no worthy principle, debauched by intrigue, without support in essential or vital forces, should now and again blow up. And it is further inevitable that in the crises that monotonously follow each other the United States, as the nearest responsible nationality, and as that upon which the world places dependence, should play a positive part. Failure on our part to meet situations like that recently witnessed in Haiti and Nicaragua will be nothing more or less than moral dereliction.

Mexico supplies an impressive example on a large scale. For thirty years and more General Diaz ruled Mexico and wrought wondrous things in the way of industrial development—and of moral development as well—in that land of amazing richness and of low human standards. But the achievements of Diaz would not have been practical or possible if there had not been back of him the moral influences—not to say actual powers—of the United States. It was only under the lee, so to speak, of the Great Republic that Diaz was enabled to sustain a system which carried Mexico at many points of development beyond the independent capabilities of her own population.

In the crisis that followed the breakdown of Madero we owed to Mexico—likewise to the world and to ourselves—such participation in Mexican affairs as would surely have sustained what Diaz built up. All that has followed may fairly be chargeable to our palterings and fumbings. "Watchful waiting" was literally the shirking of plain moral obligations. How Mexico has suffered from it needs not to be told. How grievous our own losses is conceived only by the few who have immediate relations with or exceptionally close observation of Mexico and the Mexicans.

One of the things lost to the United States by the series of contradictory stupidities that have marked American policy in matters relative to Mexico in the past eight years was respect for American character and fear of American power. The Tampico incident with the futile occupation of Vera Cruz, the silly make-believe chase after Villa; these, with our supine endurance of insult upon insult and injury upon injury, gave to the average Mexican—with reflections as far down as the Isthmus and even beyond—the notion that Americans are a pack of cowards and their government a bluff. Much that has happened to mar the record in these recent years may be characterized as a direct product of this conception. Relief has come to us as a by-product of our participation in the European war. Mexico and Latin-America in general know now that Americans can and will fight and that the Washington government when once it is aroused is a force that would better not be fooled with. Thus what he lost through "watchful waiting" and through supine acceptance of unnumbered kicks and cuffs has been regained, not indeed by the energies of our government as addressed to Mexico, but through a chance that came with the European war. The contempt which the Latin-American world felt for us has been superseded by a species of respect that, discreetly employed, may still work wonders for humane progress in Mexico and elsewhere.

Time will surely come when Mr. Harding as President will find it necessary for this country to play the rôle of guardian to incompetent states, in some sort as we have done it in Haiti. It may even be necessary for some department of the government as it shall be organized by Mr. Harding to do for one of these countries what Mr. Roosevelt boasts of having done in the case of Haiti. Always and everywhere it falls to the strong to care for the weak; and it may easily happen that there will lie upon us an obligation which will employ some other department official to write a constitution for some petty country in need of one, but lacking the skill or the authority of "self-determination." And in such an emergency it may befall that some long memory shall recall the answer to Mr. Roosevelt's vainglorious boast, to Mr. Harding's confusion.

All the proprieties, all the dignities, all the discretions of campaign practice tend to discredit personalism in any and every form on the part of a candidate for the presidency. Better far that candidates should resist the temptation to sharp rejoinder and limit their utterances to exposition of party principles and to individual ideas of constructive statecraft. Through disregard of this policy in recent weeks Mr. Cox has measurably lost respect as a man of elevated character and of constructive mind. On the other hand, Mr. Harding has gained in public consideration by his addresses dealing upon high ground with governmental affairs. The answer to Roosevelt is his one notable slip, and we profoundly hope it may not be duplicated in the weeks to intervene between now and November 2d. Mr. Harding will do well to let Mr. Cox do the mud-slinging and Mr. Roosevelt do the boasting. They will lose rather than gain by it. The best retort to impertinence and stupidity is dignified reserve.

The President's Condition.

The only evidence in recent weeks that Mr. Wilson is functioning as President is the appointment of Miss Boardman and J. Thilman Hendrick as civilian members of the board of commissioners for the District of Columbia. It is common belief at Washington that he is somewhat improved in health, but this is disputed. The mystery of his condition is precisely what it has been during the past year. Last week the press associations, evidently under instruction from the White House, told how Mr. Wilson had been observed to walk without assistance from the door of the White House to his motor-car. There are those who doubt if it was the President who performed this feat. One intelligent correspondent who witnessed the passage from the door to the car insists that there is some mistake. The man who walked out of the White House door, he asserts, was erect, had color in his cheeks, and had a well-filled-out face. The President, whom he saw two days later, he describes as bent and stooped, pale and emaciated.

It is remembered that in other days Mr. Wilson surprised his friends and the public by sudden lapses from vigor to illness and as suddenly from illness to vigor. One who attended a reception at the White House some three years ago, and who saw Mr. Wilson after he had been standing for three hours, described him as "looking like a ghost and barely capable of maintaining an erect attitude. His jaw sagged, his eyes were glazed, his powers of speech almost gone." "Two days later," says the same observer, "I saw him on the street and observed that he was erect, buoyant, a picture of health." It is probably one of the sudden changes which mark the contrasting conditions of Mr. Wilson that was observed by the correspondent above quoted. The general opinion of Washington is that since last week he had suffered a temporary setback.

It is the judgment of the medical profession, based upon the little that is publicly known, that while Mr. Wilson may live for years, his health will never be what it was—that in truth he is doomed for the rest of his life to invalidism. It is understood at Washington that he is not doing any kind of work and that in the future nothing is to be expected of him. He ought to do what the similarly affected President of France has done. The wonder is that he has not sought surcease from responsibility by voluntary retirement, for which he would be abundantly justified by his condition as it is today and as it has been since September, 1919.

The New York Bomb Outrage.

Some three years ago a bomb was discharged on Market Street in this city in the midst of a crowd assembled to witness a patriotic demonstration. Ten persons were cruelly murdered and some thirty more as cruelly injured. The leading perpetrators of this terrible outrage were quickly apprehended and promptly convicted. In intelligent and fair minds there was not the first question as to their guilt. But before the righteous judgment of court could be carried into effect there was instituted a world-wide campaign to "save" the criminals. Organized labor, which so often is led to forget its legitimate purposes and to take up unworthy causes, lent effective aid. The President of the United States was led through fear of political consequences to join in the movement. One Mooney, notoriously guilty, was elevated in many minds into a species of hero and martyr. In consequence there was given to "direct action" a kind of recognition that has tended to make it in many disordered minds both justifiable and heroic. It would be assuming much to say that the terrible event which within the week has so shocked New York and the country at large is a direct result of this sentimental folly. None the less there is a relationship between the two incidents. If to Mooney and his associates there had been meted out the severity which they so definitely merited it would have discouraged incendiarism, and we may easily believe that it would have had the wholesome effect of stifling criminal spirit, or at least of checking criminal action. What has happened in New York may fairly be characterized as a consequence of the agitation that followed our Preparedness Day parade and gave courage to the desperadoes of the "red" movement. Among the agencies grossly blameable in this wretched business is our radical newspaper press. Its attitude towards the Mooney case in its various phases has had in it both suggestion and inspiration for the enemies of social order. Probably those guilty of this latest outrage will be apprehended; and as probably we shall have a repetition of what was enacted in behalf of Mooney with similarly demoralizing effects. Let us hope that in the immediate case justice will move with a quicker step and hold a firmer course.

Editorial Notes.

Mr. James M. Beck puts the case over-emphatically in the declaration that "Britain faces social revolution." What is happening in Britain is an evolutionary democratic movement. Through it there will be worked out a scheme of things very different from what has ruled in the past. But there will be no revolution, as that term is commonly applied and understood. Britain has not the revolutionary habit. Her governmental and privileged classes long ago learned the wisdom of concession. Through concession they have avoided—and the country has escaped—experiences that have shocked other lands, notably France more than a century ago and just now Russia. We may easily believe that in the immediate future there will be troublous times for Britain, but there will be no revolution of the violent sort that has checked the progress and destroyed the prestige of other countries and systems.

Aerial mail service may or may not become a dependable thing—probably not as between the opposite sides of the continent. Its value lies less in its promise of speed or certainty in mail delivery than in its development of aerial machinery and in its service as a training school for airmen. In these relations it is well worth while and it fully merits all the support it is likely to get from the national treasury.

In the recent primary elections no incident was more notable than the success of Senator Lenroot of Wisconsin in the face of active and bitter opposition on the part of Senator La Follette. La Follette, whose personal machine has now for a good many years carried pretty much everything before it, exercised the utmost of his powers to defeat Lenroot, but without effect, as the latter's majority of 30,000 attests. There is today no more effective man in the Senate than Lenroot and there is cause for gratification in the assurance that he is to begin another term next March.

Things that have happened and are still happening in relation to the presidential campaign provoke speculation as to the practical utility of that time-honored institution, the Party Committee. Here we are within six weeks of election and only just now have the campaign text-books, compiled at great expense, become available. In the effort to make the campaign books "take in everything" their issuance has been so delayed that more than half the campaign period has passed before their appearance. Not even yet is the Democratic book available in San Francisco.

Conditions in the Democratic committee are sadly confused. Nobody knows exactly who is boss. Chairman White's name is still at the top of the letter-heads, but there is little doubt that he has practically been eliminated under an ultimatum from the White House and that Representative Cantrill is actually in charge. There is loud complaint of lack of funds; none the less there appears to be plenty of money to do unnecessary and foolish things. We suspect that there is less suffering from poverty at Democratic headquarters than from factional contention and top-heavy organization.

There has never been a time when the diplomatic corps held a more important part in the social life of the capital. The White House now for eight years has been practically closed so far as social activities are concerned. There are few members of the cabinet and of the dominant party in the Senate able financially to do much in a social way. Pretty much everything that goes to make up the life of Washington society has been abandoned to the members of the diplomatic corps. Always popular in Washington, the diplomatic establishments have become special centres of hospitality. Individuals attached to the embassies and legations have held in recent months an altogether exaggerated place in the social scheme. At all social gatherings secretaries and attachés are eagerly sought for. The country clubs bid for their affiliation and attendance. To be a diplomatist in Washington, even in the humblest rank, assures a certain prestige and an obvious popularity. The reason is not far to seek. The diplomatic corps is not bound by the Eighteenth Amendment. Its members may bring into Washington and to their abodes those cheering liquids which are otherwise outlawed. And it may be said to the credit of the members of the corps that they are universally generous to their friends.

The new administration in Mexico under the presidency of General Obregon starts with better prospects than any of the several government organizations that have recently preceded it. Obregon is a man of intelligence, of industry, and of personal force. He knows the country and understands its needs. He speaks English—when he chooses to do it, which is not always—and he knows that the first necessity is peace, since only through established order can there be developed the credit essential to industrial and social revival. For reconstruction and for new construction Mexico needs money in large sums. Her only chance of getting it is by the creation of confidence in the United States. Obregon's efforts are very obviously being directed to these ends, and he is going at his task with energy and determination.

The obstacles that lie in Obregon's path are many and serious. Perhaps most immediately pressing is the necessity for getting rid of the three hundred or more "generals," each drawing a salary of 500 pesos a month, who are sticking like leeches to the government treasury. There can be no effective reestablishment in Mexico until the enormous military graft is removed; but there is serious danger in its removal, due to the fact that each officer upon his dismissal becomes a centre of disaffection. That Obregon will have the strength to do what must be done primarily and to get the Mexican government into working shape is doubtful. There are those who think he may succeed. Others—including Americans who conceive the situation even more accurately than any Mexican—believe that the task is greater than the capability of Obregon or any other domestic force. The Argonaut thinks it knows something of Mexico and of the Mexican situation. It believes Obregon to be the best hope of Mexican reorganization at the hands of the Mexicans. But it does not look to see a sound and stable revival of orderly life in Mexico until Uncle Sam shall put his hand to the job. The future of Mexico, if Mexico is to have a future of real importance in immediate times, we believe rests upon some arrangement under which the United States shall hold to that country a relation similar to its relation with Cuba.

Governor Coolidge is carrying himself in the campaign with great dignity. His speeches are brief and always to the point. There is the note of conviction in everything he says; and there is especial wisdom in his often-repeated remark in protest against the Wilson scheme of the league of nations that "unless we cherish liberty and prosperity at home we can not promote these interests abroad." Among the many nails that Governor Coolidge has hit fairly on their heads none is more definitely pointed than his definition of "Wilsonism" as the supreme issue of the campaign. This is the truth reduced to the simplest formula. The Democratic candidates stand for the Wilson policies; the Wilson system in government. The Republican candidates, on the other hand, stand for return to government under the terms, conditions, and guarantees of the Constitution. To this primary issue all else is subordinatedly related.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Senator Phelan and the Japanese Issue.

SANTA CRUZ, September 15, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: The great issue in both the presidential and the senatorial campaigns is the league of nations. Apart from the general question of going in with, or without, reservations or staying out altogether, this issue has a peculiar and overshadowing interest for California and the Pacific Coast, for it involves its present and might come to threaten its future.

No question strikes as nearly home or is as ominous in California as that presented by the Japanese. Like the poor, it has come to be always with us. The Japs absorb our land, invade our markets, and imperil our trade and political domination. They threaten us from within and from without. If an absolute bar is not erected in the near future to Japanese immigration, emigration from the Island Empire may swamp the Coast within measurable time.

This situation is neither one of surmise nor guesswork, but a real and living one that is recognized in greater or less degree from Seattle to San Diego. No one has comprehended it more thoroughly or treated it more combatively than Senator Phelan—when in California and when up for reelection.

In Washington, however, Senator Phelan's record on the Japanese question is not as aggressive nor yet as clear cut or as clean. Throughout the long fight in the Senate to Americanize the treaty Senator Phelan recorded himself in every test vote as against Americanization. He as well put himself on record as in favor of the upbuilding of Japan by voting to give the Island Empire control of the Province of Shantung. The covenant of the league of nations, which Senator Phelan has voted many times to accept without change, provides among other things:

Article 13. The members of the league agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which can not be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject-matter to arbitration.

Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty as to any question of international law * * * are declared to be among those which are generally suitable for submission to arbitration.

The members of the league agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered and that they will not resort to war against a member of the league which complies therewith. In the event of any failure to carry out such award the council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto.

Article II, p. 2. It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations, which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

If we should join the league of nations on Senator Phelan's terms Japanese immigration is a difference of opinion that beyond question would be translated without undue delay into an "international dispute" that would of necessity have to be submitted for decision to the council of the league; a decision which we would have bound ourselves in advance to abide by.

A cable from Tokyo under date of September 13th states that already "Kokumin Shimbun," a Tokyo newspaper, urges the Japanese government to bring before the league of nations the Japanese situation in California.

No less an authority than the lord chancellor of England has publicly and specifically stated that if America joins the league the question of Japanese immigration into this country would have to be submitted to its council for decision.

How, then, can Senator Phelan reconcile his votes to join the league and his attitude on the Japanese question in his present campaign for reelection to the Senate. They are as flatly contradictory of each other as the man who answers another's argument by calling him a liar.

Postage stamps made by the United States government are handled by machinery, and do not touch a human hand until ready for purchase by the consumer. Then there are machines to moisten and press the stamps.

New Jersey is to pay its prisoners for their work while in jail to give them a fair start when their terms are completed. The experiment is receiving wide publicity and probably will be copied in many states.

SILVER LININGS TO EASTERN CLOUDS.

So the Greeks are to have Constantinople. The news has not been officially confirmed, but it seems to be one of those pronouncements set afloat in such a way that it can be denied if a denial should be necessary. The governments of Europe do that sort of thing. Sometimes it is called a ballon d'essai, and its object is to ascertain the direction of the wind of public opinion. If the wind should be unfavorable the démenti can follow quickly. But the news is probably true. The Greeks want Constantinople. They want it badly. Small wonder, when we remember that the ancient name of the city is Byzantium, and this is a name to conjure with in Oriental Europe. There is an old prophecy of a great war that shall establish the Greek at the Golden Horn, and old prophecies play no small part in the politics of the Old World. Byzantium was the fountain head of ancient glories, and the glamour of sentiment and romance enfolded it. It was the birthplace of Eastern Christianity and of the great schism that split in two the Christian world. If the Greeks shall establish themselves at Constantinople they will assuredly change its name to Byzantium or show themselves strangely indifferent to the spell of a mighty word, a thing that they are by no means likely to do. For them it would be the rebirth of the nation and they would see new vistas of a shining renown stretching ahead of them.

A thousand years ago and more Christendom was sending great armies into Asia for the redemption of the sacred places, and particularly of the tomb of Jesus. Clemenceau was ill advised when he reminded the Sheikh Feisal that the rivalry between Europe and Asia stretched back to the Crusades. "I am not a deep student of history," said the Sheikh, "but will you please tell me who won the Crusades?" It was a keen thrust from the Oriental blade. Europe, for century after century, had tried to possess the Holy Sepulchre. She watered with her pious blood the road to the Orient. Kings and emperors walked that via dolorosa, and the rescue of Jerusalem was the dream of nations, the inspiration of their heroes and their saints. And it was all in vain. The Mohammedan had set his grasp upon Jerusalem and not all the power of the old chivalry could wrench it away. Indeed that grasp was tightened and extended. Out of Asia came the Moslem hordes and they took Byzantium, hardly less sacred than the Sepulchre itself. Very nearly they took Vienna, too. But for Poland they might have made themselves masters of Europe, and the green flag of the Prophet would have floated from the Orkneys to Ceylon, from the Baltic to Cape Colony. It was a "man raised of God," said the old chroniclers, who halted the power of the Turk and saved Europe and the world. We do not particularly believe in God nowadays, nor in men "raised of God," but he must indeed be lacking in imagination who could look unmoved upon Jerusalem in Christian hands and upon the return of Byzantium to its original owners. None the less let us do justice to the Turk. Perhaps it is among the last gift that he has any reason to covet, but none the less one may say a good word for him without a violation of the verities. The Turk did no harm to the sacred tomb. Indeed he protected it. He even set a guard of Mohammedan soldiers within it in order that the rival sects of Christendom might be prevented from doing murder in order to manifest their love of God. The Turk has never done any harm to the Mosque of St. Sophia. He did not even efface the religious paintings on the walls, although he covered them with his own tapestries. Underneath the mosque, in its crypts, there is said to be a mighty collection of early Christian books and documents. The Turk has respected them, although he would allow no one to examine them or even to see them. Many years ago a great English newspaper sent a carefully selected representative to Constantinople armed at every point with credentials and recommendations. His orders were to secure access to the crypts of St. Sophia and to report on the literary treasures that they contained. But he came back empty-handed. The Turk was obdurate. He said that the books and documents were safe, but they were not to be shown. Not even under the stress of the recent war did he tamper with these treasures.

The Mohammedan animus against Christianity is of a peculiar kind. Mahomet may fairly be charged with the proclamation of eternal war against Christians, indeed against "infidels" of all kinds. But this was not because he considered that Jesus was a false prophet, which is precisely the term that the followers of Jesus have always applied to him. His quarrel with Christians was not because they followed Jesus, but because they did not follow Jesus. He said in effect that God had sent Jesus with a gospel of love and the world had rejected Him. Therefore God had sent Mahomet with a gospel of the sword. Love and death had been the alternatives and the world had chosen death, which seems true enough when one comes to think of it. If we turn to the Koran, which, like the curate's egg, is "good in spots," we shall find it there stated: "It our apostles with manifestations, and we sent down by them the Book and the Balance, that men might stand upright in equity, and we sent down Iron, wherein is great strength and uses for men—and that God might know who would help Him and His apostles in secret; verily God is strong and mighty. And we sent Noah and Abraham, and we gave their seed prophecy in the Scripture: and some of them are guided, but many are disobedient. Then we sent our apostles in their footsteps, and we sent Jesus the Son of Mary, and gave Him the Gospel and put in the heart of those that follow Him kindness and pitifulness." If Mohammedans have not always followed the precepts of their prophet we may perhaps look upon their religious deviations with some toleration. We ourselves are not ideal in this respect. We may also remember that Mahomet not only proclaimed prohibition, but enforced it, which is a good deal more than we are able to do.

Let us forget for a moment the political import of this transfer of Constantinople and Jerusalem to Christian hands. We are not likely to forget it for very long because it will be the match thrown into the powder magazine of the Mohammedan world. England and France would never do this thing but for the overwhelming pressure of the churches, anxious to efface the Mohammedan blemish from the face of a continent otherwise solidly Christian. It is curious that Christian Europe, with the single exception of Russia, should have been so wholly indifferent to the centuries of suffering under Turkish rule endured by Serbians, Bulgarians, and Montenegrins and should now be so mightily moved by the tribulations of the Armenians. The power of Europe has been on the side of the Turk and against the Balkan Christian for hundreds of years and we may therefore doubt if the present zeal of Europe against the Turk is to be considered as the fruit of religion undefiled. Perhaps it is rather a result of opportunism and of religious ambition.

But what a good time the bibliophile, the antiquary, and the archaeologist will have in Constantinople, in Jerusalem, and in Asia Minor. What storehouses of antiquities are waiting there to be rifled by reverent hands. The Turk has never been favorable to exploration. He himself has no intellectual curiosities and he can not understand why any one else should have them. Probably he has not the slightest idea of the nature of the literary treasures in the St. Sophia crypts. It may be doubted if he has ever even glanced at them. Undoubtedly there are other such treasures in Jerusalem, and it is said that ancient volumes purporting to come from Jerusalem are already making their appearance in London. Jerusalem is one tangled maze of archaeological values. The traveler has been allowed to look at them so far as they are unavoidably visible, but he has not been allowed to dig or to go into dark places. There would have been no exploration of Egypt if the Turk had been allowed to maintain his control over that country, a control that some of our good self-determinationists seem so anxious to restore. The least sign of an undue archaeological curiosity in Jerusalem would have brought the terrible horsemen of the desert storming into the streets of the city. Indeed this very thing has happened more than once, and the Turkish officials have been compelled to order all Christians to keep within their houses and behind drawn blinds until the storm had been allayed. The Turkish officials have behaved pretty decently in this respect. Well they knew the nature of the tribesmen and their insatiable furies against anything that seemed like profanation. It may be said, too, that the Turks have never persecuted the Jews of Jerusalem. At least I never heard of an instance, but it would be hard to find the Christian country in which the Jews have not been persecuted, even unto death, and there are Christian countries today, more than one, where the Jew has been for centuries, and is still, a pariah and an outcast with every man's hand against him, although his hand has been raised in violence against no man. The Recording Angel may have a long debit account against the Turk. No doubt he has. But on that sheet there are but few, if any, entries of Jewish persecution.

But it is not only in Constantinople and Jerusalem that the antiquarians will have the time of their lives. There are large areas in Asia Minor that are covered with the ruins of buried cities. No man knows to what ancient civilizations they belonged nor the quality of the men who lived in them. Many of those cities are so ancient that they are represented only by great mounds of earth that are yet shapely enough to indicate the mysteries that lie beneath. The archaeologist has cast hungry eyes upon them for years, but he has not touched them. To do that would be sudden and secret death. But he may do it now, or he may soon be able to do it when the men of the desert have realized that their dominion has passed from them. It is said that aeroplanes are already surveying the ground from aloft and that the revealing contours more readily disclose themselves from a height than from the level. Asia Minor may yet have much to teach us of the forgotten history of the race and of civilizations equal perhaps in some respects to our own who had their day and ceased to be, and that were plowed under by time that brings all things to nought as must happen one day to our own civilization unless we somewhat accelerate our pace along the path of wisdom. And of that there seem to be but few signs.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

W. J. Ferguson, a call boy at Ford's Theatre in Washington on the night of the assassination of President Lincoln, is still on the stage. He is now playing in a popular show in New York.

Among child prodigies who are winning fame and money Jesse Collins of Liverpool, England, an eleven-year-old boy, stands high. Recently he showed his extraordinary talent as a 'cellist and pianist at the Coliseum in his native city. It was his first public appearance, and critics were unanimous and unstinting in their praise.

Avery Hopwood came to New York from Cleveland in 1905, after graduating from the University of Michigan. He brought with him a play called "Clothes," and an order to write daily news letters for the Cleveland Leader. But he sold the play after four weeks in New York and gave up all thought of newspaper work and decided to devote himself entirely to the writing of plays.

Helen Maynard White, a sculptor and painter who was born in Baltimore but has made her home in Philadelphia, recently has completed an oil painting representing Christ to be presented as a memorial to the First Christian Church in Craborchard, Kentucky. It strikes a new note in modern mural decoration, being painted in white and gold, with gold illumination. The artist also is doing a large mural painting for St. Andrew's Methodist Episcopal Church in Philadelphia. Miss White studied in the Philadelphia Academy school and also under Rodin and Lazar.

Mary Roberts Rinehart is a happy woman. She has been spending the past few weeks at Eaton's ranch in Wyoming and has thus renewed her old custom, interrupted by the war, of spending her vacation in the wilds, riding, fishing, and hunting with her exclusively masculine family. It is three years since the Rineharts have been able to get together on one of these famous excursions. Even now the family is not complete, for the eldest son, Stanley M. Rinehart, Jr., is lingering in the East with another Mary Roberts Rinehart—his little baby daughter. After his discharge from the army Mr. Rinehart married Mary Doran, daughter of the publisher.

In northern Wisconsin ministering to three reservations—the Lac Court Creille, the Lac du Flambeau, and the Pottawatomes—may be found Father Philip Gordon, a Chippewa Indian priest with 3000 persons in his congregations. His headquarters are at Reserve. And for leadership in this civilization advance this humble missionary was well prepared himself. Born in a hut amid the towering pines and hemlocks of northern Wisconsin, in 1886, after a brief education in the public schools, his father moved the family to the Bad River Indian Reservation near Ashland, where the boy was duly given his allotment of land as a member of the Bad River tribe of Chippewas. After being educated in seminaries in this country and Europe and after visiting nearly all the countries of the Old World he returned to northern Wisconsin to be ordained and begin his work.

Miss Irene C. Diner is the name of a young lady of twenty-three who has achieved fame in the line of chemical research, the direct result of her determination to persevere and of her willingness to spend most of her matinee and even show hours alone with her brass and lens "toys." It was announced recently she had discovered a method by which the pathway is lighted down which chemists may travel to determine through microscopic investigation the effect of wear and of substances used in the manufacture of rubber upon the very structure of rubber itself. This means that ultimately the line of investigation which she has discovered will lead to actual determination, not only of the life which may be expected of rubber articles, but of new methods for constructing a rubber that will last much longer than that being manufactured at present. Fortunes rest upon the final accomplishment of the effort.

It was in 1913 that Alice Paul made her appearance at Washington, D. C., and started to smash staid traditions into smithereens. Old-time politicians soon commenced referring to her as "that darn Quaker girl from Jersey who is the smoothest politician in the country." Moorestown, New Jersey, has become a definite spot on the map as a result of Miss Paul having selected it as her birthplace, which event took place thirty-five years ago. As a little kiddie Miss Paul attended a Quaker school. She was graduated from Swarthmore at twenty, and later received degrees of M. A. and Ph. D. from the University of Pennsylvania. Following the gathering of this crop of education, she went to London to prepare a thesis on the position of women and to study economics. While in London she did settlement work and assisted in the suffrage campaign in England. Later she was engaged in settlement work in New York.

The Land o' the Leal.

I'm wearin' awa', John,
Like snaw-wreaths in thaw, John;
I'm wearin' awa'
To the land o' the leal.
There's nae sorrow there, John;
There's neither cauld nor care, John;
The day's aye fair
I' the land o' the leal.

Our bonny hairn's there, John;
She was baith gude and fair, John;
And oh! we grudged her sair
To the land o' the leal.
But sorrow's sel' wears past, John—
And joy's a-comin' fast, John—
The joy that's aye to last
In the land o' the leal.

Sae dear's that joy was hought, John,
Sae free the hattle fought, John,
That sinfu' man e'er brought
To the land o' the leal.
Oh, dry your glistening ee, John!
My saul langts to be free, John!
And angels beckon me
To the land o' the leal.

Oh, haud ye leal and true, John!
Your day it's wearin' through, John;
And I'll welcome you
To the land o' the leal.
Now, farc-ye-weel, my ain John;
This world's cares are vain, John;
We'll meet, and we'll be fain,
In the land o' the leal.

The Bells of Shandon.

With deep affection and recollection
I often think of those Shandon bells,
Whose sounds so wild would, in days of childhood,
Fling, round my cradle, their magic spells.
On this I ponder, where'er I wander,
And thus grow fonder, sweet Cork, of thee;
With thy bells of Shandon
That sound so grand on
The pleasant waters of the river Lee.

I've heard bells chiming full many a clime in,
Tolling sublime in cathedral shrine;
While at a glib rate brass tongues would vibrate,
But all their music spoke naught like thine;
For memory dwelling on each proud swelling
Of thy belfry knelling its bold notes free,
Made the bells of Shandon
Sound far more grand on
The pleasant waters of the river Lee.

I've heard bells tolling "old Adrian's Mole" in,
Their thunder rolling from the Vatican,
And cymbals glorious, swinging uproariously,
In the gorgeous turrets of Notre Dame;
But thy sounds were sweeter than the dome of Peter Flings o'er the Tiber, pealing solemnly;
O! the bells of Shandon
Sound far more grand on
The pleasant waters of the river Lee.

There's a hell in Moscow, while on tower and kiosk
In St. Sophia the Turkman gets,
And loud in the air, calls men to prayer
From the tapering summit of tall minarets.
Such empty phantom, I freely grant them;
But there's an anthem more dear to me;
'Tis the bells of Shandon
That sound so grand on
The pleasant waters of the river Lee.

—Francis Sylvester Mahony.

Helvellyn.

I climbed the dark brow of the mighty Helvellyn,
Lakes and mountains beneath me gleamed misty and wide:
All was still, save, hy fits, when the eagle was yelling,
And starting around me the echoes replied.
On the right, Striden Edge round the Red Tarn was bending,
And Cathedralam its left verge was defending,
One huge nameless rock in the front was ascending,
When I marked the sad spot where the wanderer died.

Dark green was that spot 'mid the brown mountain heather,
Where the Pilgrim of nature lay stretched in decay,
Like the corpse of an outcast abandoned to weather,
Till the mountain winds wasted the tenantless clay;
Nor yet quite deserted, though lonely extended,
For, faithful in death, his mute favorite attended,
The much-loved remains of her master defended,
And chased the hill-fox and the raven away.

How long didst thou think that his silence was slumber?
When the wind waved his garment, how oft didst thou start?
How many long days and long nights didst thou number
Ere he faded before thee, the friend of thy heart?
And, O, was it meet that—no requiem read o'er him,
No mother to weep, and no friend to deplore him,
And thou, little guardian, alone stretched before him—
Unhonored the Pilgrim from life should depart?

When a prince to the fate of the peasant has yielded,
The tapestry waves dark round the dim-lighted hall,
With 'scutcheons of silver the coffin is shielded,
And pages stand mute by the canopied pall:
Through the courts, at deep midnight, the torches are gleaming;
In the proudly arched chapel the banners are heaving;
Far adown the long aisle sacred music is streaming,
Lamenting a Chief of the People should fall.

But meeter for thee, gentle lover of nature,
To lay down thy head like the meek mountain lamh,
When, wildered, he drops from some cliff huge in stature,
And draws his last sob by the side of his dam.
And more statly thy couch by this desert lake lying,
Thy obsequies sung by the gray plover flying,
With one faithful friend but to witness thy dying,
In the arms of Helvellyn and Cathedralam.

STEEPLEJACK.

Mr. James Gibbons Huneker Continues His Reminiscences of the Stage and the Press.

The second volume of Mr. James Gibbons Huneker's reminiscences begins with his return to New York. He was dreaming now of becoming a writer, and at once he threw himself into the society of writing men. He found them in profusion and variety at the hospitable café of Billy Moulds. In New York the café is the poor man's club. There ideas circulate and brain tilts with brain. Perhaps there was too much drinking, but it found its compensation in vivid personalities. Mr. Huneker says he is not concerned with the salvation of his brother's soul, having trouble enough with his own, but if hedging about a growing youth with moral wire-fences will keep him straight, then his intellectual growth is not worth a copper:

There was a sufficing cause for the punctuality of Frank and the rest of us at Moulds'. Free-lunch! Up at the Hoffman House you could eat a regular course dinner on one drink, but you had to tip the waiter a quarter; at Moulds' there were no tips, nor was there an assortment of dishes. The glory of the establishment was its bean soup, hot, savoury, plentiful. Oh! that bean soup. How many famished stomachs it soothed and nourished in the days that are no more! Pardon me if I shed a lyric tear over its memory. Billy Moulds retired years ago to darkest Brooklyn, and when I meet him I speak of the fabulous soup. His invariable answer is: "It saved some of you fellows' lives, didn't it? But do you remember Otto and his razzle-dazzle?" I did. He meant Otto Floersheim, who had devised a mixture of brandy, ginger ale, and absinthe that was warranted to knock a horse down. It never failed Floersheim, who introduced the concoction to Albert Niemann, the Wagnerian tenor, a drinker that would have pleased Pantagruel. To see this pair of monsters guzzle the poison made shudder a sensitive and beer-absorbing soul. Niemann could booze all night till next midday, and then sing Siegmund that evening in a marvelous manner. But not marvelous, vocally speaking. His acting, the assumption of the character, was the chief interest. His voice had gone before he visited us. In fact it was beginning to go at the first Baireuth Festival in 1876.

Mr. Huneker seems to have known every musician of the day whose name has ever been heard of. About Paderewski he becomes enthusiastic. He appeared to be the reincarnation of Thaddeus of Warsaw. Paderewski wanted him to edit a projected musical journal in London, but New York pulled too hard for that. But of some other musicians the author is not so enthusiastic:

Nordica never impressed me as a genius, as did Lehmann, Ternina, and Fremstad. She had not much emotional draught. She was not temperamental in their sense. Her voice, too, sweet as it was, never thrilled. She was not a Brunhilde born nor could she sound all the notes of Isolde's tragic octave. But she had charm, and before she entered the Felia Litvinne class of operatic heavyweights she was pleasant to gaze upon; towards the end of her career she looked like a large, heavily upholstered couch. She was a "slow study," but stubbornly industrious, and underwent the torture of one thousand piano recitals before she ventured to sing Isolde. At the last one her faithful accompanist became so enthusiastic over her singing that he expressed it in unmistakable masculine style. A furious chase ensued and Nordica, after dodging her adorer, finally slipped out of the room. She told me the story with such realism that I asked her why she troubled herself about such a little thing as a kiss, and her reply was truly feminine: "He had been eating garlic."

We have some good stories of Oscar Hammerstein, who was a "gambler born." He played with men and millions, as prodigal with his own money as were others with the money of strangers. We are told of the composition of Hammerstein's original operetta, which was the result of a wager:

Oscar, becoming excited, offered to compose an opera, words and music, in forty-eight hours. Kerker took him up. The thing became serious. Rooms were engaged on the top floor of the Gilsey, an upright piano installed, and, cut off from the outer world, Hammerstein began fingering out his tunes, writing words, putting them all on paper. I forgot to add that Gus Kerker agreed to arrange the music for orchestra. We had lots of fun. Louis Harrison engaged a relay of hand-organs to play under the composer's windows, but Oscar never wined; plates of sinister ham sandwiches were sent to his room accompanied by cocktails. And the tray was returned empty with many thanks. I've forgotten all the pranks we played to no purpose. Complaints were made by sundry guests at the office that a wild man was howling and thumping the keyboard; again uselessly, for, barricaded, the stubborn composer refused to give up the fort. Exhausted, but still smiling, he invited the jury on awards to listen to his music. It proved a tuncful hodge-podge, as might have been expected, and Kerker threw up the sponge. The opera was actually produced at the New York Theatre a few months later, reinforced by extra numbers and considerably edited, and it met with success. That first night of "The Kohinor" was a notorious one; also side-splitting. The audience, of the first act. Oscar knew the art of camouflage before the word was invented. Two comic Jews, alternately for a half-hour sang: "Good morning, Mr. Morgenstern. Good morning, Mr. Isaacstein," while the orchestra shifted the harmonies so as to avoid too much monotony; I fancy that was a Kerker device. Oscar "composed" a second operetta, but it never achieved the popularity of the first.

Dvorak is another celebrity embalmed by Mr. Huneker. On his first encounter with the great Czech composer Mr. Huneker invited him to take a drink, and he nodded his head, "that of an angry-looking bulldog with a beard." Other drinks followed in which Dvorak, or Borax, as he was popularly called, bore his full part:

But Borax! I left him swallowing his nineteenth cocktail. "Master," I said, rather thickly, "don't you think it's time we ate something?" He gazed at me through those awful whiskers which met his tumbled hair half-way: "Eat. No. I no eat. We go to a Houston Street restaurant. You go, hein?"

We drink the Slivavitch. It warms you after so much beer." I didn't go that evening to the East Houston Street Bohemian café with Dr. Antonin Dvorak. I never went with him. Such a man is as dangerous to a moderate drinker as a false beacon is to a shipwrecked sailor. And he could drink as much spirits as I could the amber brew. No, I assured Mrs. Thurber that I was through with piloting him. When I met Old Borax again at Sokel Hall, the Bohemian resort on the East Side, I deliberately dodged him.

Mario is another of the author's celebrities, and Mario seems to have suffered much from matrimony. On one occasion he invited Mr. Huneker to visit his studio, where his wife, Mme. Miramelli, was training a new vocal discovery:

She was at her piano, a battered instrument still serviceable, and she only inclined her head on my entrance. Evidently I was not too welcome. In the middle of the room stood a young girl of seventeen or eighteen. She was blonde of complexion and dressed her hair in foreign fashion. She was indifferently clad. To tell the truth, I was taken by her face, not so pretty as attractive. Her features were irregular, her nose snub, but her large blue eyes—the clear eyes of a congenial liar—blazed with intense feeling and her mouth quivered. No wonder. Mme. Miramelli had been scolding her. "Lyda," she screamed—a long name followed, Slavic in sound, beginning with the letter Z—"Lyda, you sing like five pigs! If you sing thus to the gentleman, I believe a critic"—she lifted her savage old eyebrows sardonically—"you will drive him away. As for my beloved husband"—more pantomime—"he thinks you are to become a second Gerster or Nilsson. Don't disappoint him, for he is the greatest living ex-barytone and a wonderful judge." She would have continued this nasty railing tone if M. Mario hadn't entered and seated himself near the girl. His wife stared at him and his eyes fell. Shrugging her fat shoulders, she cried: "Again! Skip the introduction, begin at the aria." She struck a chord. The girl looked entreatingly at the husband, who literally trembled: his expression was one of mingled fear and admiration. His eyes blazed, too; he folded his arms and his whole being was concentrated in his hearing.

The girl sang. He had not boasted, her voice was like a velvet bell. She sang with facility, though her musical conception was immature, as might have been expected. Without doubt a promising talent.

Mr. Huneker eventually joined the staff of the New York Sun and succeeded in pleasing Mr. Laffan, at that time the proprietor. While in Paris he had written art criticisms for the Sun, and he now joined the staff:

Thanks to the editor-in-chief, Edward Page Mitchell, I wrote signed and unsigned book reviews on the page made famous by Hazeltine. Edward P. Mitchell is an editor in a thousand. To work with him is a privilege and a pleasure. He always gets the best from a man. Sympathy is the keynote of his character. Chester S. Lord, for so many years managing editor, I knew before I wrote for the Sun. We had foregathered with Edward A. Dithmar, dramatic critic of the Times, and Montgomery Schuyler, Lawrence Reamer, and other prime spirits in Perry's old drug store. Not without warrant was Mr. Lord rechristened the "Easy Boss." Beloved by his "young men," as he called them, though some were gray, he also had the disagreeable task of lopping-off heads, which task he accomplished in a humane manner. I lost my "official" head once—some friction between the upper and nether millstones in which I was ground to powder—and no executioner could have been more "easy"; besides, he knew I would return. I was always returning to the Sun. It is a superstition. Just to encourage struggling "journalistic" talent, I may tell out of school that I was paid the highest salary in town as a dramatic critic, $125 a week, and I still cherish the little pay envelope on which I wrote as Finis, "The last of the Mohicans." This was in 1904. But I earned much more when later I wrote art criticisms, editorials, book reviews, and travel notes for Mr. Mitchell. Those were the palmy days when the handy all-round man had his innings. Now each department is "standardized." Newspapers have lost their personal flavor. Huge syndicates have taken the color and character and quality from daily journalism. I am quite sure that if ever a comprehensive history of the Sun is written my name will be absent simply because I would be considered a myth, a figment of a fantastic imagination. Much of my Sun work appeared, duly expanded, in Iconoclasts, Egoists, and Promenades.

Mr. Huneker does not believe much in the influence of the critic. The public performer does not care much whether he is blamed or praised, provided he is mentioned. The mud or the treacle is soon forgotten, but the name sticks. There is a large element of charlatanism in every one who earns his living before the footlights of life:

In his peculiarly amiable manner, George Bernard Shaw once reproached me with being a hero-worshiper of the sort who, not finding his idol precisely as he had pictured him, promptly tweaks, pagan-wise, his sacred nose. George probably thought of me as a pie-eyed youth who was all roses and raptures, one who couldn't see through the exceedingly large rift in the Shavian millstone. He changed his mind later. But I am a hero-worshiper. I have a large fund of admiration for the achievements of men and women, and I can admire Mr. Shaw simply because he so admires his own bright, particular deity, Himself. But I can't go off half-trigger if the target is not to my taste. Many times I have been dragged to the well and couldn't be made to drink; not because of the water therein, but that I wasn't thirsty. I have with all my boasted cosmopolitanism many "hindi" spots, many little Dr. Fells, the reason why I can't not tell. It was with difficulty I read Arnold Bennett, notwithstanding the joy he gave me in "Buried Alive," yet I couldn't swallow "Old Wives' Tales"—the hissing lengths of s's—nor that dull epic, "Clay-hanger." Mr. Bennett, whose touch is Gallic, who is first and last a trained newspaper man, is out of his depth in the artistic territory of Tolstoy and Hardy. He is not a literary artist like George Moore or John Galsworthy. But Mr. Bennett enthralled me with his "The Pretty Lady," an evocation, artistically evoked. So thus I had to reverse a too hasty judgment upon Arnold Bennett, whose resources are evidently not exhausted.

The author has a large admiration for Conrad. He is an artist, and because he is an artist he never tries to prove anything:

He takes pride in his profession, yet is free from vanity or self-seeking; indeed, he is far from being a practical man. This worries him more than it does his friends, and the fact that he is not a well man is another thorn in his flesh. For months at a time he is tortured by rheumatic gout, which illness keeps him from his desk; thereat much wrath and many regrets. However, the optimistic spirit of the great artist shines through the mists of his pessimism. In his reminiscences you will find a veracious account of his childhood and his early passion for the sea.

Later in the afternoon of my visit he astonished me by transforming himself into an Englishman. He sported a monocle and his expression was haughty as he drove his car over the smooth Kentish roads. The Slav had disappeared. He spoke no more of art, but dwelt on his gout, his poor man's gout, as he smilingly called it. Too soon, I was standing on the platform of Ashford station en route for London. Conrad is only one of his names, his family belongs to the Polish nobility, but the magnetism of the waters drew him to the sea in ships, and only accidentally did he become a writer. Accident! Chance! It is a leading motive of his fiction. One night sitting in a café in Ghent, Maurice Maeterlinck conversed with his friend, Charles Van Lerberghe, a Belgian writer of originality, and that same conversation proved a springboard for the art of the younger man. Van Lerberghe indicated; Maeterlinck developed. Chance, again, or divination! Joseph Conrad is of the company of Flaubert, Turgenyev, and Dostoevsky. "Not yet is Poland vanquished."

Mr. Roosevelt naturally finds a place in the gallery of celebrities. Mr. Huneker expected to find him a "man of the pavements," but instead he discovered a scholarly man and fond of the arts, possessing a store of good pictures and of good books:

He showed me some of the trophies he had acquired in Europe while on his Grand Tour. One was a photograph of the late Andrew Carnegie taken in Berlin during military manoeuvres. Both Colonel Roosevelt and Mr. Carnegie were guests of Kaiser Wilhelm. On the photograph the Kaiser had politely scribbled: "That old fool, Andrew Carnegie," probably alluding to the projected Peace Palace at The Hague. Young Philip Roosevelt was visiting his uncle that day. I had previously met him. War was discussed by the Colonel with the zest he displayed to the last. I told him that I had been present at the formal opening of the Peace Palace in September, 1913, at The Hague, and that the day was so hot that all Holland fled to the beach at Scheveningen, adding that I believed the palace would eventually be turned into the finest café in Europe. And I printed this prophecy (?) in the New York Times in my reporting of the hollow mockery. One question I permitted myself: "Colonel, would the Lusitania have been sunk if you had been in the White House?" Snapping that formidable jaw of his he exclaimed: "I don't think there would have been a Lusitania incident if I had been President." I believed him.

Mr. Huneker lived at a boarding-house on West Twenty-Fifth Street, and there he met David Belasco, who urged him to write plays. At this same boarding-house there was a farewell dinner to a singer who was about to marry a celebrated actress. Every man there, says Mr. Huneker, except himself had been on friendly terms with the bride, and if the bridegroom was overwhelmed with emotion it was, perhaps, because he knew this:

It makes me think of the two young women in Paris who found themselves at a monkey cage in the Zoo. They were experienced members of a very ancient profession, and as the agile and grotesque animals were playing all sorts of silly tricks, one girl said to the other: "Give them clothes with money in their pockets and they would be real men." Did I ever tell you the witticism of Maurice Barrymore concerning a fiasco made by a foreign-born actress of a certain reputation at the Manhattan Opera House? Barry supported the lady, whose voice was not powerful enough for the big auditorium. I asked him how she succeeded—I was at another theatre. "Obscene but not heard," he answered. I have told you that I knew Willie Wilde, Oscar's brother. He was a companionable pagan. Every ten minutes he would light a fresh cigarette, every fifteen ask for another drink. He invariably preluded with "I have a zoological feeling that I may be thirsty." Getting up at 5 in the afternoon finally got on the nerves of his wife, Mrs. Frank Leslie, and she divorced the poor chap, who did hate to work.

George Bernard Shaw receives a whole chapter all to himself, and one not wholly free from a very proper malice. Mr. Huneker suggests that if Mr. Shaw is brilliant on bran, what would he not be on beef and beer:

Perhaps Bernard Shaw does furtively eat roast-beef sandwiches, and at midnight; perhaps he does secretly sip Shandy-gaff—not Kit Morley's hypocrite draught, but the garden variety of half ale, half porter. Perish the proposition! Shaw eating meat would cause more of a row than did the revelations of Anna Seuron, the governess in the Tolstoy household, who had caught old man Tolstoy in his bare feet and at the pantry gobbling raw beef. And the hour was midnight. That beef leading-motive resounded the world over. In a roundabout fashion, I heard that one morning while at Lady Gregory's, Mr. Shaw came down to breakfast in a truly masculine mood. He must have glanced cannibalistically at the cutlets, for Mrs. Shaw warningly exclaimed: "Now, George." He is said to have uttered Banshee curses and to have pitched in and eaten a pound of meat—or was it hog and hony? Ochone! And he may have smoked a pipe in the hidden gardens of Coole Park! But I shan't vouch for the respectability of the anecdote, nor am I violating confidence, as it was told me without restrictions, though not by Lady Gregory.

Shaw, says the author, never had an original idea. He pulled the feathers from Ibsen, Strindberg, Hauptmann, Sudermann, Maeterlinck, Marx, Nietzsche, and Samuel Butler. And with the throwing of that particular bombshell he reaches the last pages of his amusing reminiscences.

STEEPLEJACK. By James Gibbons Huneker. Volume II. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

The search for convenient ways of transportation by which the products of the Sudan may reach the outer world attracts attention to a remarkable phenomenon of vegetable life on some of the head waters and tributaries of the Nile. This consists of enormous growths of papyrus and other plants, completely covering the streams and forming carpets of vegetation two or three feet thick, beneath which flows the water. Navigation by small boats is, of course, prevented by this obstruction, which is in places supplemented by vines and overhanging plants that arch the streams from bank to bank. Heavy floods occasionally sweep away the accumulations of plants, but they are quickly reforming.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending September 18, 1920, were $200,600,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $182,900,000; a gain of $17,700,000.

Gold held by banks in the Twelfth Federal Reserve District decreased $2,118,000 during the week, but the total of gold reserves increased $2,154,000, and total reserves increased $2,077,000, according to the weekly comparative statement of condition made public Saturday, September 18th, by the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco.

Total gold reserves this week are reported at $163,951,000, of which amount $64,319,000 tion, and movement per day per car has been expedited in a way to give the railroads new facilities equal to the use of many thousand additional freight cars. The roads are handling a large volume of business and their managers are doing the best they can to give the country the service which it needs. The taking effect on August 26th of the increased freight and passenger rates was an event of great importance to the American people, for it meant that the roads would finally have enough revenue to provide for their enormously increased operating charges, to purchase necessary equipment, and to show net earnings sufficient in the long run to attract capital (says the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank in the September number of the Business Outlook).

The Federal Reserve Banks lately established a new high record for total discounts and also for volume of discounted commercial paper. The bank position has been well maintained, however, the effort being to discriminate sharply in favor of really productive loans. This choice is altogether necessary at a time when there are said to be about five foreign borrowers and three domestic borrowers for every free dollar there is to lend. There is still a large volume of unliquidated commercial loans which must be paid off gradually and in such a way as not to cause commercial unsettlement. Much has already been accomplished in this direction in such commodities as silks, leather, and wool. The country's loan account has thus been purified materially and while much remains to be done we may note with satisfaction that the Federal Reserve System has shown itself highly efficient during the period when its facilities were being put to severe tests. The next few weeks will witness the adjustment of some large corporation loans as well as arrangements to make further advances to borrowers abroad. One incident of this credit pressure has been a general reaction against extortionate prices for merchandise, foodstuffs, and other supplies. People everywhere are becoming impressed with the necessity of getting better value for the household dollar, and slowly but surely general business is being reestablished upon a lower price level. Besides this the people are saving more than they did in the days of easy profits when there were three jobs for every applicant. With the increased immigration, however, and the reduced working hours observed by the textile mills, the silk mills, and a few other industries, the efficiency of labor is increasing and the average worker is striving harder to do a fair day's work.

The public is gradually increasing its investments in good securities and paying off loans which have been continued since the era of Liberty Bond flotations. Even the treasury certificates of indebtedness are largely passing into the hands of individual investors, for the records show that of the $2,590,000,000 of those securities outstanding at the close of July, $1,940,000,000 were held by individual investors and only $650,000,000 by the banks. A canvass recently conducted in the Second Federal Reserve District showed that forty-eight out of sixty-eight country banks interrogated purchased in July a greater number of Liberty Bonds and notes for their customers than they sold for their customers. It is to be hoped that this movement will continue, for it shows that government securities are passing into strong hands and that bank credit, formerly tied up in loans secured by Liberty Bonds, is being released for the accommodation of commercial borrowers. The investment inquiry is likely to increase with the approach of the quarterly dividend disbursement period in which probably $150,000,000 of new money will be made available for reinvestment. The American people have enormously extended their foreign investments since the world war began, and the success attending the loans recently offered shows that when securities of a type considered really safe are offered they find a ready market if the interest rate is high enough, and at present it appears that 8 per cent. income return will attract general investment support. The pronounced success of the great French government loan has stimulated investment inquiry and will probably cause other governments to offer loans in the United States in the near future. The French loan has proved popular with small investors, being offered in hundred-dollar bonds as well as large denominations. The whole world is pressing its demand upon American markets for new capital, for funds with which to finance new construction work.

According to report to E. H. Rollins & Sons the Santa Barbara Gas and Electric Company, a subsidiary of the Southern California Edison Company, for the year ending July 31, 1920, had net earnings of over three and a half times total bond interest charges, showing an increase in net of more than 15 per cent. over the figures for the preceding year. The total report follows: Gross earnings, $370,703; operating expenses and taxes, $235,639; net earnings, $135,064; bond interest, $38,035; balance before depreciation, $97,029.

The field of railroad operation is growing less hazardous and the grade crossing safer to the public, according to interesting statistics assembled by R. J. Clancy, assistant to the general manager in charge of safety for the Southern Pacific Company.

The "Stop—Look—Listen" campaign inaugurated by the road and followed up persistently has brought about a reduction in grade crossing casualties in the face of a large increase in the number of automobiles in use in the territory traversed by the Southern Pacific lines. Whereas in the first six months of 1918 there were 23 people killed and 85 injured at grade crossings, during the same period in 1919 there were 17 killed and 80 injured and for the first six months of this year fatalities were reduced to 13 and 61 injuries.

This achievement in accident prevention is regarded particularly noteworthy in view of the fact that about two-thirds of the mileage of the Southern Pacific is in territory where climatic conditions permit motoring every day in the year and the range of automobiles per capita of population is among the highest in the United States. California rivals all states, having now about one-tenth of all the automobiles of the country.

The comparison of casualties to employees, reportable to the Interstate Commission for the first six months of the years noted shows:

	Killed.	Injured.
1918.....	29	1436
1920.....	20	1129

Computed on the basis of locomotive miles and man-hours, these casualties show less than one fatality per 1,000,000 locomotive miles and 3,000,000 man-hours in the first six months of this year.

Mr. David Blankenhorn of the Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company left recently for a visit to the Los Angeles office of the firm.

The Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company report that their recent offering of Market Street Realty Company first mortgage 7 per cent. serial gold bonds and Tubbs Island Company first mortgage 7 per cent. serial gold bonds have been practically sold out. The readiness with which investors have taken these two issues indicates the popularity of these forms of investment—one being a first mortgage on property situated in the heart of the city and the second a first mortgage on prime farming land within a short distance of the bay market. Both these issues are offered on a 7.50 per cent. basis and are legal investments for California savings banks.

Does anybody, asks the Wall Street Journal, "believe that all the unmarried wage-earners earning twenty dollars a week, or one thousand dollars for the completed year, or the married wage-earners with twice that amount in their pay envelopes, paid income tax?" Does anybody, it continues, "believe that the number who paid even approaches the number who escaped?" This financial paper is convinced that most wage-earners who should be paying a tax are not doing so, and that it is in the interest of the public to see that these taxes, small in each individual case, but large in the aggregate, are collected in full. This is one of the things they do better in Britain, we are told. In the United Kingdom over two billion dollars was collected in income taxes from wage-earners last year. Did we collect any such from this source? "And if not, why not?" The Wall Street Journal proceeds:

"We all know that the man on a salary can not get away. Not only does he state his salary in his income-tax return. The truthfulness of his statement can be immediately checked by the returns which his employers must also make. But the industrial wage-earner is not checked in the same way, or, indeed, as refers to the greater part of him, in any effective way. He can plead periods of unemployment, irregularity in the amounts received, changes from one district to another or from one factory to another, and other things which make it possible to profess inability to make a return. But the British income-tax commissioners accept no such excuses.

"Their method is summary, but essentially just. They say: 'You are a carpenter, and the wages in the trade have been so much in the past year. We shall, therefore, assess you for the year at those wages, and you can prove to us what part of the year you were unemployed.' The same method is followed with farmers, who so largely escape in this country. Failing a return, they are assessed at three times the rentable value of their farm, whether owned or rented. It is up to them to explain how their earnings were less than the estimated amount. The English farmer soon learns how to keep books under pressure like this. He can not, moreover, plead that the cost of living for himself and his family is part of his operating expenses. The doctor can not plead it here nor the editor. At least we should insist that our income tax play no favorites.

"Additional expense in collecting the tax is well worth while for the moral effect of bringing home to the wage-earner his direct personal interest in businesslike and economical government."

Labor troubles throughout the world are engrossing more and more our attention, especially now that the Italian situation has become so critical. The difficulties incurred by the general business world in reverting to pre-war conditions naturally have been accompanied by a great deal of discontent among those who work with their hands, and their state of mind generally has been such as to encourage a sort of propaganda that has been causing a great deal of difficulty in this country as well as elsewhere. The times are such that it requires a good deal of level-headed thinking and action in order to prevent more serious developments.

The $100,000,000 8 per cent. French loan offered to our investors at par with a sinking fund redemption as high as 110 was snapped up eagerly. It is a big thing that the French government has done in definitely establishing its credit in this manner, despite the obviously expensive terms. It means that for some time to come borrowing rates will be at least as irksome as heretofore and possibly more so.

There has been a good deal of hullish sentiment encouraged in the railway list by further estimates as to profits that will accrue through the new rate schedules. Some of the cheap common stocks that in former days were scarcely looked upon as dividend possibilities suggest under the new conditions some reward to their holders. Of course, any overhlying on the part of the public on margin even in this section of the list is likely to develop unfavorably in view of the general money situation.

The election of Obregon as president of Mexico opens up an era of real prosperity for that country. Lying at our very doors, Mexico offers a greater field for successful exploitation in manifold ways than any other country in the world at present. Of course developments there will be of essential importance to vast oil enterprises in which our people are heavily interested, and it is to be hoped that such difficulties and disputes not only between the Mexican government and the oil producers, but among the oil producers themselves will be amicably adjusted.

The important merger in the chemical industry that was announced this week may be followed by some other combinations in our industrial world. Perhaps the most important mergers to come, however, will affect the railroads of the country, for under the new law opportunities for favorable mergers open out rather extensively.

There has been a chance for those important interests which supported the market during the recent breaks to secure rather extensive profits, and the general outlook is for a rather irregular market the rest of the month, and one in which at times it may be that bearish interests will control.

E. H. Rollins & Sons and associates are offering a new issue of $675,000 Seattle, Washington, School District No. 1, 6 per cent. bonds, due 1923 to 1960, at prices to yield from 6 per cent. to 5.65 per cent. according to maturity.

This school district includes the City of Seattle and a few suburban communities and has, according to the latest census, a population of over 315,000.

Its net bonded debt is reported at only about 3.15 per cent. of its total assessed valuation.

The outlook is optimistic (says A. W. Coote in the Market Bulletin of September 17th). World confidence is being restored. The most important event of August was the defeat of the Bolshevik military forces in Poland. The news now indicates that the Soviet government is doomed, that there will not be a combination of the Russian Soviets and German Radicals; that the economic reconstruction of Europe soon can be undertaken energetically and trade credit extended to Europe; that Germany will make a more earnest attempt to meet speedy obligations. Business men from the Atlantic to the Pacific express the belief that the tide has turned.

Financial circles believe that arrangements have been made successfully to meet during the next two months the sharpest financial crisis which we have had since 1907. The Federal Reserve ratio is now above 43 per cent., and can decline to 38 per cent. before the legal minimum is reached. Commodity wholesale prices are steadily declining, and this is relieving the strain on credit. Arrangements are being made to pay off the $500,000,000 Anglo-French loan on October 15th; $150,000,000 of this will be refunded by first borrowing in America on terms acceptable to financial centres. When the crest of the fall crop movement is over it is apparent that interior banks will be able to repay credit extended by New York, and that the situation then will become easier. Some eminent financiers, in fact, are predicting that probably within eighteen months, and certainly within two years, money will become a drug in the market, and its owners will compete for opportunities to put the money at work at prices ranging between 5 per cent. and 6 per cent.

At this time the average index figure of twenty-two staple foodstuffs is 125 as compared with 154.7 in June, a reduction of 18 per cent. This compares with a high 155.5 in May of 1920, and the average index figure for the year 1916 or 74.9. Wholesale commodity prices exclusive of foodstuff have declined to an index figure of 3.43 as compared with 3.71 in June. During the last month prices of twenty rails have advanced $4.56, and the average yield on twenty Class A bonds has decreased .07 per cent.

The labor shortage is steadily diminishing. During the last two months there has been a general decrease in employment. The Department of Labor in Washington reports that in about seven hundred factories which employed 658,000 workers in June there was a decrease of 40,000 workers in July. The July pay-roll was $2,750,000 less than in June. The decrease in workmen was 6 per cent. In 114 iron and steel mills workmen decreased from 192,000 to 189,000. August figures are not yet available, but preliminary estimates show a sharper decrease in employment than during July. Immigration is increasing.

One of the most remarkable economic changes made recently is that in the status of railways due to the new rates now having gone into effect. Under the new railway law, which charges the Interstate Commerce Commission with the duty of establishing rates which provide net earnings of not less than 5½ per cent. on property valuation for the railroads as a whole, the rails are made more trouble-proof than any other American industry. There has been a marked increase in railway operating efficiency under private ownership as shown by figures for May of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Union Pacific, for example, shows an average movement of freight cars of 69.7 miles per day, as compared with 47.7 miles per day in May of 1919, and the Chesapeake and Ohio a car movement of 38.2 miles per day as against 27.1 miles per day in the preceding year. Union Pacific showed net tons per car for May of 1341, as compared with 792 tons per car for the preceding year. The freight congestion is being slowly but steadily cut down, coal is being moved so rapidly that dangers of a serious coal famine are minimized, if not actually dissolved, and with the delivery of goods, immense funds heretofore tied up in inventories of undelivered materials are being released.

Another bullish condition affecting the nation at large in general, and the rails in particular, is the size of the grain crop.

Kansas has a wheat crop estimated at 125,000,000 bushels as against an average of 105,000,000, a corn crop of 128,000,000 bushels as compared with only 69,000,000 bushels last year; in Nebraska the corn yield is 212,000,000 as against 184,000,000 last year; in Missouri the corn crop is 200,000,000 bushels as against 155,000,000 a year ago, and in Iowa, with 412,000,000 bushels of corn, the yield is far above the average. The total corn crop amounts to 3,000,000 bushels, the spring wheat crop is 50,000,000 bushels ahead of last year, and the oat crop shows an increase of 150,000,000 bushels. While the financial requirements for moving this immense crop is a severe strain on financial centres, they have been anticipating and preparing for it for months, and when this money shall finally have been distributed it will add enormously to the purchasing power of the country, and a large proportion of it will be redistributed in smaller banks throughout the states.

With prices descending, with labor becoming more plentiful, with bumper crops, with money loaned to Europe beginning to return, and with provision apparently having been made for our seasonal crop-moving financial strain, the pessimist apparently has but a slender thread of sustenance; his long-promised panic seems to be retiring into obscurity, and, on the other hand, the optimist who is willing to hack his optimism with action apparently faces more opportunities for highly profitable investment than have been available heretofore during the last generation.

The silver lining of the clouds of present uncertainty is beginning to show itself.

Psycho-Analysis.

This is described as a psycho-analytic study of religion, but it may be heartily recommended to those who want a general survey of the psycho-analytic system in its relation to human consciousness. The author tells us that it has been corrected by Dr. Coriat, and it may therefore be regarded as in every way authoritative.

With the main functions of the Unconscious Mind—surely there was never a worse term—the world of psychology is now generally familiar. But to the lay reader it will seem that the Unconscious Mind has been vastly overweighted with functions. We are asked to assume that the totality of the human mind is divided into two compartments, as it were—the conscious and the unconscious. Whatever can not be assigned to the conscious must be relegated to the unconscious. Thus we are told that the unconscious is responsible for our desires, our prejudices, our loves, and our hates; that the unconscious is indolent and insatiable, that it is appetite, that it is of far greater extent than the conscious, that it can assemble mental material and return it to us in artistic shape; that it preserves all life records; that it is inspiration and genius. One wonders which is the dog and which is the tail, whether the unconscious is god or demon, and how it managed to combine the functions of an ape and of a saint. It is much as though one were to assert that everything eastward of California was desert because there is desert in Arizona, and then to maintain that the skyscrapers of New York are a species of cactus.

The application of such reckless generalizations naturally leads the author to equally reckless assumptions. Thus we are told that the love-life of Paul is "violently repressed," that he "derives pleasure from the sufferings of others," that he takes "lustful pleasure" in the stoning of Stephen, that he is the victim of "hysterical hallucinations," that he has symptoms of "anxiety hysteria," that he has "visual and auditory hallucinations," that he is afflicted by "hysterical blindness," and that he loves to inflict upon himself the cruelties that he once inflicted on others. "Only thus can we understand the endurance of his later life." Certainly the author has a curious idea of heroism.

Now most of this is unqualified nonsense, and rather offensive nonsense. Anything, it seems, that transcends the normal, no matter how divine it may seem, is no more than a chance invasion from the lumber room of the unconscious. It is no more than another example of the unscientific theorizing upon pitifully insufficient data that characterizes so much of the pseudo-science of today.

RELIGION AND THE NEW PSYCHOLOGY. By Walter Samuel Swisher, B. D. Boston: Marshall Jones Company; $2.

A Strange Novel.

Noel Carton hates his wife. So, it may be said, do a good many other men, but they bide the fact, or try to. Noel Carton proclaims it loudly and incessantly, without reservations or mitigations. He married her because she was rich and he could not live on his income. In other words, she bought him, and she acts as one does act toward purchased goods. It may be admitted that Noel is a good deal of a worm, and yet, in a sense, rather a manly sort of worm.

It is a difficult story to review, although an easy one to read. Mrs. Carton taunts her husband with not having brains enough to write a servant girl's novelette. So Noel decides to do so. Having been attracted to a very pretty girl he makes her his heroine, and also assigns fictional places to his wife and himself. Henceforward the story—the real story, not Carton's novelette—runs along three lines. There is the voracious story of Carton himself. There is Carton's novelette as he writes it chapter by chapter, and there are Carton's dreams, which play a rather weird part in the whole fabric. It sounds rather confusing, but it is not so, not at all. The idea may also seem a rather trivial one, but it is not trivial. Indeed it comes close to being tremendous.

THE STRANGENESS OF NOEL CARTON. By William Caine. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

A French Grammar.

This book by Philippe de la Roquette of the Romance Department, Columbia University, is for secondary schools and colleges. Its author says of it in his preface, "In this grammar special attention has been given to the points of contact between the English and the French tongues. . . . The attention given to the grammatical nomenclature, to drill in oral and reading exercises, to topics of composition and conversation, and to the presentation of idiomatic expressions and of the equivalent terms in the two languages, will have value in making clear to the student the nature of the French language and the relations borne by it to the English language."

It may be said that these claims seem to be fully borne out by the text.

The Wildcat.

No one can tell a negro story better than Hugh Wiley. No one can enter more deeply, intimately, and sympathetically into the consciousness of the negro.

Here we have the story of a negro soldier in France. We are introduced to Vitus Marsden while pursuing his peaceful avocation of cutting laws. Vitus needs a pair of shoes. Hence the industry. But the octopus tentacles of the draft seize upon Vitus, or the Wildcat, and we find him serving his country in France. Henceforward the adventures of the Wildcat are continuous and original and we feel that the author has drawn a composite picture in which every negro characteristic finds its place.

THE WILDCAT. By Hugh Wiley. New York: George H. Doran Company.

The Wall Between.

This story of New Hampshire life is based on the feud between two families, the Websters and the Howes. Some forgotten ancestor has built a wall between the two estates and the repair and maintenance of this wall is the bone of contention. Then Ellen Webster, a grim and uncompromising female, sends for her niece from the West, and as she turns out to be a very personable young woman we know at once that the feud will be healed in the usual way and that the repair of the wall sinks into a position of secondary importance. The picture of New Hampshire is admirably drawn.

Utility Increases Justified

Under the above heading the following article appeared in The San Francisco Daily Commercial News, issue of September 17th:

We respectfully call the attention of all consumers of telephone, electric, water, gas, street railway and other forms of public service to the comparative schedule herein set forth:

"Unjust criticism has been directed at public service commissions in various parts of the country over increased rates allowed for telephone service, electric service, water, gas, street railway, etc.

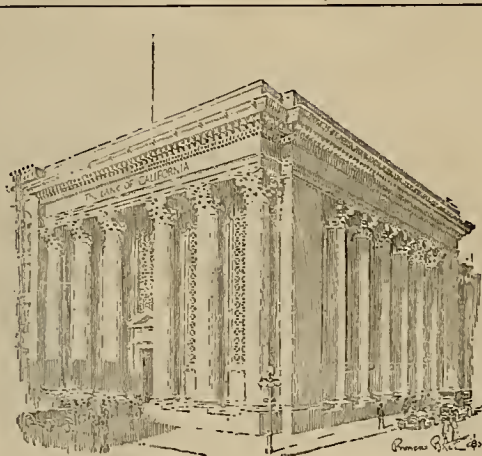

"Justifying the increases granted to public utilities in Kansas by the Kansas Public Service Commission, the accounting department of the Court of Industrial Relations has made a brief survey of the records and makes the following statement, which, it is believed, is comparatively correct. The increase in living necessities is as follows:

	Per Cent.
Forty-seven food articles.....	97
Forty-seven articles of wearing apparel.....	119
Twelve kinds of dry goods.....	200
Twenty-eight classes of house rents. 74
Eleven kinds of coal.....	70
Wages of common labor.....	150
Other wages, approximately.....	100
Material used in telephones, construction and repairs.....	97
Other material.....	100
Wages of telephone employees.....	100
Telephone rates.....	40
Electric rates.....	50

"The statement concluded with the assertion that these figures ought to convince the general public that there has been no profiteering in public utilities.

"The figures apply with equal force to all Western States. Rates for public utility service have increased less in proportion than any other commodity of daily use unless it is insurance, which has remained stationary."

A History of France.

The history of France under the general editorship of Mr. Fr. Funck-Brentano has attracted deserved attention alike by its thorough workmanship and the assignment of the various epochs of French history to the authorities most competent to deal with them. Three volumes have already appeared, and now we have a fourth volume on "The Seventeenth Century," by Jacques Boulenger, which has been adequately translated from the French. The volumes that preceded it were "The Century of the Renaissance," by Louis Battifol; "The Eighteenth Century," by Casimir Stryienski, and "The French Revolution," by Louis Madelin. Two other volumes are in preparation—"The Middle Ages," by Fr. Funck-Brentano, and "The Empire," by Louis Madelin.

The period covered by Mr. Boulenger in the present volume begins with the youth of Louis XIII and ends with a sketch of the kingdom under Louis XIV. It comprises, therefore, the vital period of the Fronde and the dominance of Mazarin.

The author may be commended on the broad base that he gives to his narrative. Never before has the mind of a nation been more worthily presented or a better emphasis been given to the great forces of literature and religion. The six volumes when completed will constitute a history of France that is likely to hold the field indefinitely.

THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. By Jacques Boulenger. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

The Door of the Unreal.

This is a story somewhat along the lines of "Dracula," but instead of vampires we have werewolves. Some strange disappearances of autoists on a much-frequented English highroad lead to an investigation of the doings of a German scientist who, with his housekeeper and daughter, has taken up his abode in a secluded country house. The worst suspicions are confirmed. The German undoubtedly has the power to change himself into a wolf, a real quadrupedal wolf, and so has his housekeeper. Thus metamorphosed they attack passers-by in order to glut their taste for warm blood. The story is well told, and we shall henceforth be on our guard against werewolves.

THE DOOR OF THE UNREAL. By Gerald Biss. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Letters from Petrograd.

There is no better form of history than private letters written without intention of publicity, and particularly when those letters constitute a record of events that were witnessed. After making all allowances for the personal nature of such communications, they constitute a distinctive record that we should be sorry to lose.

In this volume we have the letters of Mrs. Pauline S. Crosley written from Petrograd during the years 1917 and 1918. Mrs. Crosley's husband was an attaché to the American embassy at Petrograd and was therefore in a position to observe and to deduce. But her deductions are few in number. Mrs. Crosley confines herself in the main to a record of what she saw and heard, to the vivid panorama of the events that passed under her eyes. For this reason we look in vain for disclosures or revelations. There is something much better than either, a simple and direct statement of happenings that reflect the mind of the Petrograd people during those fearful days when Russia was changing her status from that of friend to foe.

INTIMATE LETTERS FROM PETROGRAD. By Pauline S. Crosley. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $3.

Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson.

The life story of Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson has been written by her sister, Nellie Van de Grift Sanchez, who very sensibly refrains from calling her work a biography. It will most interest the friends of the Van de Grift-Stevenson-Field family, for with the death of Robert Louis Stevenson the greater part of Mrs. Stevenson's claim on the attention of the general reader passed away.

Nevertheless old-timers in Indianapolis, where Mrs. Stevenson's childhood was passed, and the old guard in San Francisco who knew Sam Osborne and his wife, and who later met the Stevensons during the period of their residence in California, will no doubt read part of the book with considerable interest.

Also the numerous references to Mr. Stevenson and occasional descriptions of the phases of life in which he figured will interest those who still are collectors of Stevensoniana.

A gossip interest will also attach to the book, which is not too literary to attract such readers as will like to delve into the past revived in Mrs. Sanchez' book and follow up allusions which include once familiar names.

The story goes back to the family beginnings, and the author betrays a naïve pride in their good old American ancestry. She indulges in various reminiscences, sometimes of a trivial nature, and the book, in its entirety, is a eulogy of a faultily faultless being. However, Mrs. Stevenson had a full life and met many interesting people whose regard and admiration she seems to have attracted, and the book will number readers in Europe as well as in America.

THE LIFE OF MRS. ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. By Nellie Van de Grift Sanchez. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $2.25 net.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

According to a recent announcement from Henry Holt & Co., Hilaire Belloc's translation of "The Principles of War," by Marshal Foch, which they have just published, is the only authorized English translation of this classic, and so far as is known, is the only American edition by which the author profits. The foreword was written especially and exclusively for this edition by Marshal Foch, the publishers say.

W. L. George, the English author who is now visiting America for the first time, and whose novel, "Caliban," has just been published by the Harpers, has been confined thus far in his inspection of America to the east coast by the demands of friends; but he expects soon to start for Chicago and the other large cities throughout the country on his lecture and study tour of America.

It is a curious fact that Robert Louis Stevenson has become better known for the plays he didn't write than the ones he did. During his life he wrote several plays with W. E. Henley, among them "Deacon Brodie" and "Admiral Guinea." But since his death the dramatization of his books, "Treasure Island" and "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" (Scribners), have been far more successful than his regular plays ever were, and a new laurel has just been added to his dramatic crown in the success which Walker Whiteside is having in Earl Mason's dramatization of "The Master of Ballantrae."

D. Appleton & Co. are issuing the eighteenth edition of Edward Bellamy's "Equality." The same publishers also announce the forty-second edition of W. S. Jevons' famous volume of economics, "Money and the Mechanism of Exchange," and the fiftieth edition of J. William Draper's "History of the Conflict Between Religion and Science," a standard work which has even been anathematized by the Pope and translated into every major language.

PEACHES AND CREAM.

The Marcus Show of 1920 has advertised so freely the amount of "cuticle"—as it is tastefully put—displayed by the Marcus "peaches" that the banner audience of Monday night assembled with delightful anticipations of being terribly shocked. Mais rassurez vous, mes enfants. The Marcus peaches showed the usual amount of uncovered territory; no more, no less. When I say usual I mean what is usual in the "Revue" form of theatrical entertainment; which means, to be explicit, the throat, neck, arms, arm pits, and a generous area contiguous thereto, all of the back, and sometimes all of the front—with coyly concealing breast-plates—down to the waist line. Occasionally there is a bare circumference of flesh below the waist line. As for the legs and feet, they are often seen entirely bare. At first, during the bare-flesh régime, they used to have the skirts reach the hollow below the knee. Now they only come down—when they are worn at all—to the billowy swell above the knee. In fact, so unwilling are the enterprising theatre men to disappoint the trusting public that in the "trousseau bazaar" of the Marcus show the shopgirls had the backs of their skirts turned up like a squirrel's tail, so that the fair charmers looked as if they were going to be collectively spanked. Can managerial consideration go further?

The Marcus show is a great show of its kind; no mistake. The tired, etc., forgot his tiredness on Monday night and stood in long rows in order to get a good seat, for well he knew he must be all eyes. Nor did he look at all tired, although, oddly enough, the women in my neighborhood raved about the show much more than the men. I think, however, that they—the men—were in a state of ecstasy beyond words; something like that condition of stilly bliss that children get into when they are being granted their first view of the Christmas tree or listening to a fairy story.

In spite of the open, if jocular, appeals made by the Marcus advertisements to the pruriency of possible patrons, I am convinced that this chorus-girl worship of the male American is mixed up with the instinctive normal delight in beauty, youth, and symmetry instilled by wily nature, who has her own purposes. There is even some form of idealization in it—bleuded, no doubt, with grossness superimposed, often, by the coarser-minded comrade; for states of mind of markedly different nature will overlap each other.

And the dimpled girls do look extremely pretty: the Marcus people have seen to that. For they are of a symmetry and a youngness! Some of them—you can tell it by their blatant, artlessly howling voices in the chorus—not really out of their later childhood's years.

The Marcus people have gone in strong for costumes; and there are several costume parades that strike you dumb when you think of the cost of materials. I hasten to add, lest there may seem to be an inconsistency in my statements, that most of the gorgeous stuffs took the shape of the briefest of hodies and slender draperies trailing on the floor, leaving the contours of their wearers liberally revealed. I never saw so many towering head-dresses in my life. But there were such gauze fluffings and crystal and jewel-colored headings and ornaments and fringes and tassels and hands and strands of color and lustrous glow that, in the midst of all this light, airy, gorgeous setting the pearls of pretty girlhood moved across the stage as glidingly as ships in full sail, and looking like pieces of showy hric-à-brac. In fact they looked like particularly gorgeous "air castles": those funny little survivals of the Victorian ideas in house decoration made of ribbons and silk scraps and glittering heads hung on symmetrical wire shapes that people used to suspend from their chandeliers.

If the girls were the peaches of the show the cream was not forgotten. This was supplied by the comedians, two of whom, Messrs. Sacks and Abbate, proved themselves experts in their craft. An old stager who has lived through many shows of the kind can easily be lulled into a temporary nap by a long procession of mute, slowly gliding beauties, hypnotizing them into sleepy immobility by their shining splendor, but this pair of comedians were death on slumber. Their humor, naturally not of the highest type, was nevertheless real humor, and they kept us laughing and laughing until we were silly, and then we became helplessly apologetic; and still we laughed.

Mike Sacks—such is his euphonious name—specializes as the Hebrew comedian, and never misses a trick: while Charles Abbate plays the calmly contented idiot who is so full of complaisance that we were spared the usual kicks-and-cuffs line of comedy. Mr. Sacks paints innumerable expressions of a general, huffed-by-amiability line on his features, while Mr. Abbate in the amiable imbecility so comically portrayed, is as successful in banishing all human expressiveness from his countenance as his co-comedian is in making his a battlefield for conflicting rucfulnesses.

There was, of course, a lot of dancing in the show, Mlle. Marion, a temperamental brunette of light and dainty shape and exquisite grace, being the dancer-in-chief. Loleta and Martinez Randall also shone in this respect, and there was the usual pair of male dancers who danced in mathematical unison.

The highest scenic effect of the performance was the undersea view, in which Father Neptune and nymphs of the deep moved against a glimmering blue-green background of light and shadow.

This was followed by a living representation of Bougureau's "Birth of Venus," the apparently nude models, in spite of the veiled hints thrown out by a sapient management, being snugly clothed in the wedding usually worn in exhibitions of the kind, such as we have seen several times at the Orpheum. The living picture was really a thing of beauty, the model beautiful in shape, and a beautiful, soft, diffused glow playing over the group.

And speaking of the Orpheum reminds me that these "Revue" performances are really sublimated vaudeville, and this one had the usual number of specialties: accordion playing, dancing, comic interludes, occasional spectacle, singing, and costume displays.

Mr. Marcus, like Raymond Hitchcock, hit on a novelty in his opening of the show, all the performers being brought forth and introduced one by one by a pretty spokeswoman, the girls gracefully conscious of their thrilling costumes, the men a little hit out of countenance in their black and white harness of conventionality, but all knowing perfectly that the show was sure of a hit.

"BUDDIES."

War buddies and war daddies are both in town, but of the two I choose the "Daddies." "Buddies" is quite a come-down after "Mamma's Affair." On the surface it sounds all right: a lot of doughboys, billeted at a farm in Brittany: a benevolent, widowed farmer, with three daughters; sweetheating in a state of incipience between "Bahe," the favorite doughboy, and Julie, the favorite daughter. The doughboys cut jokes and antics, and occasionally they sing—flat; unless they are singing sharp.

And Julie talks, and talks, and talks. My grief, what a long tongue that young woman has! Her loquaciousness is really enervating, after it once gets started, and one wonders how such a grief-stricken young woman—father and brother both killed in the war and Julie given to long, sad, solitary walks—can endure her own society, with that gymnastic tongue in a state of inaction. I really think they'll have to get out the shears, and snip off—no, not Julie's tongue, but some of those lines that give it such interminable activity.

The play, although it is by George V. Hobart, is a rather naïve affair. There are several languages spoken in it—doughboy English, doughboy French, Brittany or pigeon English, and the sad young soldier who supplies the pathetic note speaks romantic-play English, while two or three people sling around some good, working French. But Mr. Hobart didn't make the best use of his opportunities when he had his doughboys tackle the French language. They weren't funny enough.

The piece is a comedy with music, but Mr. B. C. Hilliam's music is only so-so—which the singing wasn't—and while the doughboys were a pretty creditable group they were only near-funny. There wasn't hubble enough either to their lines or to themselves. The device for making the speaking of English plausible was too far-fetched and there wasn't enough backbone to the story. In fact it had affiliations with the old-fashioned melodrama—where Mme. Benoit, the farmer, belongs—which they now travesty on the vaudeville stage.

The three male players—Denman Maley, Joseph Herbert, Jr., and Ignacio Martinetti—were the best of the company, Olive Reeves Smith supplying a large element of conscientiousness in her work.

In other respects the piece is well put on, and it had a favorable verdict in New York: although probably with a more metropolitan group of players.

MEMBERSHIP NIGHT.

If the entire programme offered on membership night at the Players Theatre was equal in merit to the part that I saw the members have good reason to be proud of the contribution: for contribution it was in part, such well-known artists as William Crane, Beatriz Michelena, and La Estrellita lending éclat to the event by the nature of their offerings.

Beatriz Michelena, the movie star and "California prima donna," evidently finds time during her picture-play activities to keep up vocal practice, for, in the warm Italian soprano she rendered with grace, sympathy, and emotional charm the famous Butterfly aria and Massenet's "Elégie."

La Estrellita repeated the beautiful shawl dance we saw once before, draping her sinuous figure, strikingly clothed in clinging black as a suitable background to the gorgeous, many-hued shawls, in the richly-tinged beauties, and ardently expressing in pose and movement a rich, glowing vitality and a sensuous joy in mere living.

George Ade's one-act comedy, "The Mayor and the Manicure," a typically American piece in its ready humor, its expressive slang, and its delightful genuineness of tone, was rendered in first-class style, the presence of that sterling veteran comedian, William H. Crane, in the cast, stimulating Mrs. Duffy, Miss Myers, and Mr. William Hanley to a spirited cooperation in accomplishing an effect of reality.

The ripened art of this veteran never fails

The Tenants Paid

The Service Department heard of a case recently where the property-owner added excess water charges to the rent.

This property-owner found that his water bills were considerably above normal—sometimes the excess ran as high as ten dollars.

That the water was wasted by extravagant use there could be no doubt—a careful survey of the premises showed pipes and fixtures O. K.

Garden irrigation was one of the principal sources of waste.

Streams of water were used to drown a little garden that had done nothing to deserve such cruel treatment!

There was water waste indoors, too—some of it quite wanton waste, some of it due to carelessness.

The property-owner was not getting a square deal.

So he notified his tenants that, above a very liberal maximum, they would have to pay for the water used.

The tenants protested, but the property-owner was firm.

He didn't have to put that water surcharge on the rent bill more than once.

After the first month the tenants showed a proper regard for the property-owner's interests. They found that they could save a great deal of water without stinting their needs.

This was an extreme case. Most tenants have the same dislike for water waste that the housewife has for waste of food.

to give delight, so completely does he enter into a rôle, so ever-fresh and vital are his humor and sincerity, and so entirely does he make the lines he utters the apparent expression of his real self.

The musical branch of the club is now hard at work on its rehearsals of "Ruddigore," which Americans finally dared to separate from the taboo placed on it by the oddly conservative British because of its title, and the opera had a long run last season in New York.

It will not be, however, until October 4th that the Players Theatre will formally inaugurate its fall season and its new policy of nightly performances in repertory, upon which occasion great variety is promised.

The opening performance will consist of four one-act plays, all of which are by San Francisco writers, and one of which, "The Chinese King's Daughter," by Henry Kirk, will be played by an entirely Chinese cast.

Alternating with this programme and with "Ruddigore" there will be a revival of the very commendable production of "Richard III."

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

"Well, that's enough to try the patience of Job," exclaimed the village minister, as he threw aside the local paper. "Why, what's the matter, dear?" asked his wife. "Last Sunday I preached from the text, 'Be ye therefore steadfast,'" answered the good man; "but the printer makes it read, 'Be ye there for breakfast.'"—Toronto Evening Telegram.

The Curran Theatre.

"Buddies," now playing at the Curran Theatre, is as clean as a rain-washed flower garden. There is no discount on this New York success. It came to San Francisco with the same company that kept the people of New York and Chicago laughing and applauding for a whole year.

George V. Hobart wrote the play and B. C. Hilliam is responsible for the music. The play contains all the traditions of home and country, friendship and love, interwoven with pathos and humor, telling the story of a lot of American soldiers billeted in a quaint village in France.

"Buddies" will remain at the Curran Theatre for one more week only, closing with the performance of Saturday night next.

The Alcazar Theatre.

From the joys and vexations of "Daddies" this week the New Alcazar Company will pass next Sunday afternoon to the first enacting upon the Pacific Coast of the absorbing mystery play "At 9:45," by Owen Davis. "At 9:45" gripped New York nearly all last season when produced by William A. Brady at The Playhouse. It discloses innumerable surprises and complications during the investigation of who shot young Howard Clayton in the library of his father, Judge Clayton. The characters in "At 9:45" are of fashionable society, and the action runs swiftly from a mansion on Fifth Avenue to the restaurant of the Ritz-Carlton and then back to the residence, when comes an unexpected and thrilling climax. Dudley Ayres is the young army officer whose revolver was found on the scene and Inez Ragan the society belle, a fragment of whose ball gown was found clinging to a spiked fence outside. All the Alcazar favorites with special reinforcements are involved in the mysterious proceedings.

"A Cure for Curables," which William Hodge found immensely profitable in the East, and is new to this Coast, will be presented Sunday, October 3d. It is by Earl Derr Biggers, author of "Seven Keys to Baldpate," and Lawrence Whitman.

The Maitland Playhouse.

J. M. Barrie's whimsical play, "Admirable Crichton," one of the most delightful fantasies of the stage, will be presented at the Maitland Playhouse this coming week by Arthyr Maitland and his associate players.

"Admirable Crichton" is a story of the equality of man. It depicts a butler—Crichton by name—in the home of one of our rich American families. The family decides on a yachting trip. Crichton, the butler, is taken along to provide for the welfare of his employer's family and the guests. A shipwreck ensues and Crichton emerges from obscurity and menial service to run affairs and save the day. Hence the name that is conferred upon him as a distinction—"Admirable Crichton."

Arthyr Maitland will be in the rôle of Admirable Crichton, which gives proof that part will he well handled.

The full strength of the Maitland Players will be used in this play.

Announcement is made by Arthur Maitland that J. Anthony Smythe, who was a member of the players last season, will resume his work at the Maitland commencing October 4th, when John Galsworthy's "The Eldest Son" will be produced.

Miss Lucille Folsom, a gifted musician from the East, is adding to the attractiveness of Maitland performances by her harp selections.

The Orpheum.

"Bits and Pieces," the Orpheum headliner starting this Sunday, is a musical revue in which song, dance, and satire travesty six of New York's principal theatrical successes. From a scenic standpoint, it is said, the production is excellent. And it has the two capable musical comedians, Jack Patton and Loretta Marks, at the head of a large cast of girls. The six successes to be travestied are "Breakfast in Bed," "My Lady Friends," "East Is West," "The Greenwich Village Follies," "Scandal," and "Tea for Three." Each piece has its own individual scenes, as complete as the original.

Bob Carleton, writer of the popular song

"Ja-Da," with Julia Ballew, will be one of the next show's bright spots. Together they will be seen in songs and dances. Most of the songs were written by Mr. Carleton.

Dan Stanley and Al Birnes, eccentric dancers, will be seen in what they term "At the Club." Neal Abel will complete his performance with songs and soft shoe dancing.

The Briants will offer a fantastic pantomime called "The Dream of the Moving Man." Lawton, creator of new ideas in juggling, with an act said to be different from other jugglers, will be another new feature.

The two headliners of this week, Marie and Mary McFarland, in operatic songs, and Frank Wilcox and company in the comedy, "Ssh-h!" are the only holdovers. Topics of the Day, International News, and Orpheum Orchestra begin and end the show.

Scotti Grand Opera.

The early advance sale of the Scotti Grand Opera Company's engagement at the Exposition Auditorium for the six nights commencing October 4th, and Saturday and Sunday afternoons, has already brought forth such activity as to give every evidence of achieving a substantial financial success.

Advance Agent Charles G. Strakosch is now in San Francisco. Like his forerunners, Mr. Strakosch is identified with the operatic life of this country. Having been connected with the Metropolitan for the past fourteen years, Mr. Strakosch is enthusiastic over the Scotti Grand Opera Company and the prospects for great business in San Francisco. The Scotti Grand Opera Company, according to Mr. Strakosch, travels in a special train, consisting of five Pullman sleepers, four eighty-foot baggage cars, one day coach, and one dining car.

An idea of the magnitude of the Scotti stage production is given by the fact that Scotti carries eleven of the master mechanics of the Metropolitan Opera House and that it will require to "work the shows" and for each performance San Francisco stage mechanics to the extent of master stage carpenter, assistant stage carpenter, and ten men, master property man, assistant property man, and eight "clearers," master stage electrician, assistant and four operators. San Francisco's opening performance of "La Bohème" will be conducted by Gennaro Papi, known at the Metropolitan as the "little Toscanini," for Papi was brought to the Metropolitan from Italy by Toscanini himself.

Scotti's repertory is all that the most exacting could demand, including as it does, Monday, October 4th, "La Bohème"; Tuesday, October 5th, "L'Oracolo" and "Pagliacci"; Wednesday, October 6th, "Faust"; Thursday, October 7th, "Tosca"; Friday, October 8th, "Il Trovatore"; Saturday afternoon, October 9th, "Madama Butterfly"; Saturday evening, "L'Oracolo" and "Cavalleria Rusticana"; Sunday afternoon, October 10th, "La Bohème."

Symphony Orchestra.

Rehearsals of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra began last Monday morning in the Curran Theatre in preparation for the gala pre-season popular concert in the Exposition Auditorium on Saturday evening, October 2d, and the opening concert of the season on Friday afternoon, October 8th. There have been a few changes in the personnel of the orchestra, and the first-chair men for the season will be as follows: Louis Persinger, concertmaster; Artur Argiewicz and Louis W. Ford, assistant concertmasters; Giulio Minetti, second violins; Lajos Fenster, violas; Horace Britt, cellos; John Lahann, double basses; Anthony Linden, flutes; Cesar Addimando, oboes; Harold B. Randall, clarinets; E. Kubitschek, bassoons; Walter Hornig, horns; Leland S. Barton, trumpets; Frederick W. Tait, trombones; Ralph Murray, tuba; Kajetan Attil, harp; George Wagner, tympani.

For the opening concert of the season on the afternoon of October 8th in the Curran Theatre Alfred Hertz announces Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E flat ("Eroica"), Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and "Italia," by Alfredo Casella, one of the leading composers of the modern Italian movement.

"Arise!" we said in a tone admirably adapted for declamatory purposes, addressing the sluggard, who was still slugging at an unconscionably late hour. "The lark is up to meet the sun. The bee is on the wing. Remember the manner in which the experienced schoolboy read aloud the admonition to Lucy. He had been taught that when he encountered two letters of the same kind he should pronounce them 'double-o,' or whatever they might be, instead of 'o,' 'o.' So he sternly recited, not 'Up, up, Lucy,' as it was printed, but 'Double up Lucy! The sun is in the sky,' and so forth. Why do you not double up, and to your tasks away?" That is a very good story," replied the sluggard, "but it does not move me. We are told that nature does most of her repair work on us while we are in bed. It is my intention to lie here until she fixes me up so that I feel like going to work."—Kansas City Star.

Every one will be glad to learn that the Hotel Whitcomb is resuming its Saturday evening dansants in the picturesque Sun Lounge. The Sun Lounge is the most wonderful roof garden in San Francisco. Its walls are windows. The dancer gliding by can look from all points of the compass at the lights of the city twinkling below like myriads of stars. No one can resist the rhythmic beat of good dance music or withstand the charms of a highly polished dancing floor. The Sun Lounge is always a very popular rendezvous for lovers of good dancing. The first of these Saturday evening dances will take place September 25th.

Do you know that the government collects more of what is known as the luxury tax on ice-cream sodas and other small sales which carry a penny or two tax than from the sale of motor-cars, diamonds, and other luxuries? So it goes. The 10-cent piece was the foundation of the opulent film world. It is the small coin that bears the burden.

"Why are so many musicians temperamental?" "Well," replied Lewie, "if you had to play 'Hot Time' by the hour, with your heart yearning for a Beethoven symphony, maybe you'd get nervous yourself."—Washington Star.

VANITY FAIR.

The good people who were so anxious that Secretary Colby should send an army or a league of nations or something into Mexico in order to compel the closing of the Tia Juana gambling institutions should now turn their attention to France and Belgium. There are all sorts of weird stories about the doings of the newly rich within sight of the great battlefields. A veritable carnival of gambling is in progress, and it seems that a good many lachrymose and patriotic people who crossed the Atlantic ostensibly to say their prayers in the military graveyards are finding their consolation amid scenes that the elders of their churches never even heard of. The military commander at Hartmannweilerkopf recently voiced his protest against the dancing parties that were holding high revel with only a few inches of soil between their nimble feet and the faces of thousands of dead men who were hurriedly buried where they fell. There was something distinctly novel and thrilling in dancing on dead faces. Then come stories of orgies in Paris in which drugs and liquors played their usual part, with death and disgrace for a sequel. Here, too, we may identify the delicate susceptibilities of citizens who hurried to Europe to pay homage to the miles and acres of white crosses, and who found that there were mitigations even to their most sacred grief. And now comes a descriptive bulletin from Ostend, where it seems that millions of francs are won and lost every night by visitors who spend their days in haunting the battlefields, doubtless with thankful hearts that the world has at last been made safe for democracy and the croupier.

Gambling, it seems, has increased tenfold in Ostend and Calais since the end of the war. These places now rival Monte Carlo. The Ostend Casino opens at 10 o'clock in the morning; it is crowded within a few minutes, and it remains crowded all day long. The display of jewels is almost incredible. Some of them have been bought as an investment, and of course there are many worse ways of spending money than in the purchase of jewels. But most of the display represents a sordid mania for buying things on the part of people who now have money for the first time in their lives, money coined from blood and tears. Even the hatching dresses are decorated with jewels, and the best way to bedizen these garments is one of the favorite topics of conversation among the newly-rich women who are now crowding the northern watering places. Close at hand is the wreck of the Vindictive, whose hundreds of sailors gave their lives in the attack upon Zeebrugge. An automobile drive takes the grief-stricken visitor to the battlefields of Ypres and Dixmude. He can easily pay his devoirs to the thick carpet of corpses that lies beneath his feet, and he can still be in time to return for a bath in a jeweled hatching suit and for a jolly evening at the Casino, where the gold pieces flow like the cascading waters on the shore.

A correspondent of the New York Times says that the hotels and boarding-houses are reaping a rich harvest. Small blame to them. Perhaps there is no other spectacle quite so ironic as the profiteer haggling with the hotel-keeper and reproaching him for taking advantage of the necessities of his fellow-creatures. The Times correspondent says that his hotel charged fifteen francs a day before the war. Now it charges one hundred francs. To their old customers they are considerate, but their old customers very seldom come, and to their new customers the prices do not matter. Perhaps the old customers are dead, or have been so inconsiderate as to lose sons, husbands, and fathers in the war. Or perhaps they are merely ruined and are now to be found on the underpart of the great wheel of fortune that ceaselessly revolves and of which the roulette wheel at the Casino is an effective and suggestive type. Who knows? Messieurs et Mesdames, faites vos jeux. The great game goes on, alike upon the epic and the miniature stage, and the eternal Vae Victis, the immemorial Woe to the Conquered, is still our hymn of life.

Apropos of gambling, we are told by a London correspondent of the New York Tribune that the English hookmakers much prefer women customers to men, and they now have plenty of both sexes. The woman always hets upon her luck and the man hets on his calculations, and the devotee of luck is always the more persistent. The rule applies even in horse racing. The man considers the qualities of the horse, but the woman either follows her fancy or she happens to know something ingratiating or otherwise about the jockey or the trainer. The woman also places a large dependence upon the tips that she receives from friends. She has a disposition to believe that anything that is told her in confidence or secrecy, no matter by whom, is probably reliable. These peculiarities give great tenacity to the woman's hetting proclivities. So long as she believes in luck apart from calculation she will continue to follow it, and perhaps she is right, for there is nothing so entirely fatal to success in hetting as calculation. The man with a system is doomed. Fortune seems far better disposed to attend upon superstition than upon intelligence, or what passes for intelligence, where efforts are made to detect the laws that underlie what we call chance. The man who "breaks the bank at Monte Carlo" is usually the man who has persuaded some young girl to place his hets for him, or who obeys a fancy to sit in some particular chair or who selects a color by some other process equally fantastic. The number of gamblers who depend on fantastic omens or who woo the goddess of chance in other such ways is surprising. Hard-headed business men, hankers and the like, will become wholly irrational when they approach the gambling table. The man who takes care to change his seat with every hets is probably a financial magnate whose astute calculations have been the wonder of the stock exchange. Probably that other man who selects his color according to the hair of the girl opposite him is of the same breed. And, curiously enough, the spectacular winnings have usually followed some such "method" as these. Certainly they have never followed the "systems" that depend upon elaborate calculations.

There may be a good deal that we do not understand in what we call chance. Perhaps chance is no more than undiscovered law. All gamblers seem to think so. The gambler who advises you to "het on your luck" has more pragmatic common sense than he who scoffs at luck. If the color red wins twice in succession there is an irresistible tendency to believe that it will win a third time. It is no use to point out that one turn of the wheel or throw of the dice can not conceivably have any effect on subsequent turns or throws. The gambler will willingly assent to your assertion on abstract principles, but in his innermost heart he will be none the less convinced that it has, none the less resolved to go on hetting on his luck. He will admit that there can be no connection between the color of the girl's hair and the color that is about to win, but none the less he will het on the color of the girl's hair. He is inwardly and secretly persuaded that the goddess of chance is trying to convey her secrets. Her language is not ours. Not for her is the spoken word or any of the usual means of communication. Her alphabet is the omen and the presage, and from the mazes of the fortuitous she spells her sentences. Fortunate are they who can read them.

Now the woman frankly believes in the omen and the presage. If they seem to fail her it is because she has not read them aright, and not because they are not there. Better luck next time. And we may note, and it is an almost incontestable fact, that good fortune in gambling usually goes to the superstitious—so at least we are told by those in a position to speak with authority.

A President's Grandfather.

It seems to be a fact that the great-grandfather of Millard Fillmore, the thirteenth President of the United States, was a pirate, though a pirate in spite of himself.

The story begins in the first quarter of the eighteenth century, when the murderous freebooters, Blackbeard, Lov, and Phillips, swept the Atlantic coast from Jamaica to Newfoundland. Phillips, during his last piratical cruise, captured the Dolphin of Cape Ann, a vessel commanded by Andrew Harriiden. She was a better craft than his own and the pirate accordingly transferred his black flag to her and sent the crew away in another of his prizes, but retained Harriiden on board.

In a day or two Harriiden discovered among the pirate's crew two young men, John Fillmore and Edward Cheesman, whom Phillips had captured and made pirates against their will. They were brave fellows, and had determined either to escape from the pirate's clutches or to capture his vessel and bring him and his murderous crew to justice.

Noon of a certain day was fixed upon as the hour for making the hazardous attempt. When the time arrived Cheesman, the leader, Fillmore and Harriiden were on deck. Nut, the master, a man of great strength and courage, was aft, and with him were the boatswain and the gunner.

Nut and the boatswain were the two whom the conspirators most feared to encounter. Cheesman promised, however, to take care of the master if the others would take care of the boatswain. No firearms were to be used, because the noise of the explosion would alarm the pirates below.

Cheesman, who had been made the ship's carpenter, left his tools on deck as if he were going to use them about the vessel, and took a turn up and down the quarter-deck with Nut. Fillmore, as if in sport, picked up an ax and began twirling it on the point.

This was the signal agreed upon, and Cheesman grappled the master, and after a short struggle threw him into the sea. Fillmore struck the boatswain with the ax and he fell lifeless on deck. Phillips, the pirate chief, hearing the noise of the scuffle, rushed from the cabin and was at once met by Cheesman, who wounded him with a mallet.

The captors then sprang into the hold and put the rest of the pirate crew in irons. The vessel was steered for Boston, where she arrived on May 3, 1724.

Two of the pirates were hanged. Fillmore, Cheesman, and their confederates were acquitted.—Oregonian.

"Piedmont Estates" Homesites

— IN —

The East Bay's Finest Residential Park

IN BEAUTIFUL PIEDMONT, commanding a most magnificent view of San Francisco Bay and the Marin County Hills.

THIS SUPERB residential Park is situated on the Sunkist slope of the Fashionable Piedmont District and is absolutely protected from disagreeable winds.

THIS PARK has been subdivided so the contours of the land give each homesite a natural setting. This will appeal to appreciative people, who desire something different from the ordinary flat level land without inspiration or artistic merit.

ONLY FIFTEEN of these remarkable homesites of from one to four acres; each one furnishing a most picturesque location for a home of dignity and refinement.

OVER ONE MILLION DOLLARS of Piedmont's finest homes adjacent to Piedmont Estates.

CAREFULLY RESTRICTED to home costing from $10,000 upward.

THIS UNIQUE LOCATION, the splendid plans prepared for the development of this beautiful residential Park, prepared by landscape Engineers of note, and the perfect building restrictions combine to make this a home place of distinctiveness and individuality.

Descriptive literature mailed upon request.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

At one of Lady Astor's meetings in her campaign for Parliament a woman demanded to know how she would like to live on $2 a week, and when Lady Astor rejoined cheerfully that she began on less than that, another woman remarked with scorn: "There! I knew she wasn't allus a lady." Which goes to show that in politics it's hard to suit everybody.

A Sunday-school teacher, trying to impress her teaching about the future life upon the plastic minds of her youthful pupils, asked all those who wanted to go to heaven to stand up. Three-year-old Dora alone remained seated. "Why, Dora!" questioned the teacher, "all good little girls want to go to heaven. Why don't you?" "No, ma'am, we aint goin'; we're goin' back to Detroit."

A certain house employee, who makes very little money, has just returned from a buzz around the Florida health resorts. Other employees, at a loss to understand why he should spend his money in such riotous living, asked him to explain. "Well," he said, "I like the association of big men." "What do you mean association?" Bill Kenny, one of the door-keepers, asked. "Well," he replied, "one day Boies Penrose's automobile almost ran over me, and another day, when I was in swimming, I kicked Mayor Hyland on the ankle."

Abe Carter was a pious, hard-working old harky, much respected by the white people of the community. But evil days fell upon Abe. The boll weevil destroyed his cotton; his adopted baby died of the whooping-cough; his wife died of a fever; his horse was killed by lightning, and a cyclone demolished his cabin. The Episcopalian minister, hearing of Abe's extraordinary misfortunes, called to see him. "Abe," said the minister, "you have been sorely afflicted, but you must trust in the Lord; you must believe it is all for the best." "Yas, suh, boss," said Abe. "Yas, suh, I does. I feels I is in de hands ob a all-wise an' unscrupulous Providence."

Through the long summer hours she had done her best to let him see she liked him. But he wrapped himself in a cloak of cynicism and made no move. "Marriage!" he spoke bitterly. "Marriage is a mistake! Why should a man saddle himself with a wife for life, when he can buy a parrot for $5?" She hid her anger behind a charming smile. "Yes," she retorted. "There again you men certainly have the advantage. We poor women can't buy a bear of any kind under $200."

Old Portly found himself stranded for an hour or so in a strange town and decided to have something to eat. He entered the only restaurant he could find and called for a menu. "There aint one, sir," said the waiter, who looked as if he'd been blighted in infancy, "but I can tell you what's on." "Let's have it, then," said Portly. The waiter took a deep breath and recited off a lengthy list. "You have a good memory, my man," said Portly. "No, sir," said the waiter, meekly, "I just looked at the table cloth."

It was the bishop bold of a colonial see, and in the course of his episcopal visitation he arrived at an up-country farm, many miles from anywhere, the proprietor of which was very proud of his knowledge of the world and had instructed his wife to be sure and call the visitor "Lord" whenever she addressed him. The good wife was more generous-minded than her husband, and when dinner began she broke silence with the remark, "Well Bill, I don't think much of you as a helper. Give the Lord some more gravy."

The juvenile son of a professor of botany in one of the Eastern universities seems likely to become as learned as his father; already he is familiar with the Latin names of many of the specimens in the professor's herbarium. But the boy is not all botanist. He is ready to fight, as well as to study. Recently he returned home with one eye half closed and discolored. His mother greeted him with dismay. "Oh, Aleck," she cried, "you have been fighting again!" "But it wasn't my fault, mother," the boy hastened to explain. "Bill Johnson said Taraxacum officinale didn't mean a dandelion."

A good story is going the rounds of Princeton about Professor Alfred Noyes, the English poet. Professor Noyes, it is known, likes very much to read his works aloud to his friends, and at Princeton, with so many young men under him, he is usually able to gratify this liking to the full. The other day Professor Noyes said to a junior who had called about an examination: "Wait a minute. Don't go yet. I want to show you the proofs of my new book of poems." But the junior made for the door frantically. "No, no," he said. "I don't need proofs. Your word is enough for me, professor."

General Zachary Taylor, hero of the Mexican war, had a sense of humor that smacks of these modern times. Just after the battle of Buena Vista the general noticed a group of ten or twelve Mexicans gathered at some distance and apparently in consultation. The general wished to have them dispersed, so he turned to Captain Bragg at his side and said: "Captain Bragg, d'ye see that bunch of men over there?" The captain said he did. "Well, drive them away from there!" Bragg trained a cannon on the party and fired. All of the Mexicans fell, ponies and all, except two who put spurs to their nags and galloped away. When General Taylor saw the result of the shot he snatched off his cap and let out a yell: "Good hit, captain, by jingo! Set 'em up in the other alley!"

They were talking of the city government. "They all work together," one man complained. "First they let the trusts put up the price of coffee and tea till a poor man can't afford to drink 'em any more. Then the milk companies get after us and put milk out of our reach. Then comes prohibition and we can't buy beer at all. Thought the limit was reached then, didn't you?" "Sure," said the idle person, "they haven't thought of anything more to do, have they?" "But haven't they, though?" bitterly replied the discouraged one. "Don't you read the papers? When there's nothing else left to drink but water, this blasted city government suddenly wakes up and raises the price of water. What chance has a poor man to live, anyhow?"

A successful old lawyer tells the following story about the beginning of his professional life: "I just had installed myself in my office," he said, "had put in a phone and had preened myself for my first client who might come along when, through the glass of my door I saw a shadow. Yes, it was doubtless some one to see me. Picture me, then, grabbing the nice, shiny receiver of my new phone and plunging into an imaginary conversation. It ran something like this: 'Yes, Mr. S.' I was saying as the stranger entered the office; 'I'll attend to that corporation matter for you. Mr. J. had me on the phone this morning and wanted me to settle a damage suit, but I had to put him off, as I was too busy with other cases. But I'll manage to sandwich your case in between the others somehow. Yes. Yes. All right. Good-by.' Being sure, then, that I had duly impressed my prospective client, I hung up the receiver and turned to him. 'Excuse me, sir,' the man said, 'but I'm from the telephone company. I've come to connect your instrument.'"

THE MERRY MUSE.

Prometheus Bound.

Here in the voting booth I stand
And clench my ballot in my hand;
This is my weapon in distress,
This is my shield of righteousness;
Today my stature is as great
As any Eastern potentate,
And this, my summons, proudly given,
Controls the powers of hell and heaven.
Prometheus Bound has rent his chains
And rises, looming o'er the plains;
The lightning flashes from his eyes,
Illuming all our tyrannies;
And trembling on their paper thrones
The rulers and the priestly drones
Lift arms and voices in dismay
Lest the storm wash them quite away!
So, stepping to the ballot-box,
I vote for Harding or for Cox.
—Maxwell Anderson in the Nation.

Summer Resorts.

Summer resorts, summer resorts,
Various places of devious sort;
Differing from one another in glory,
Yet are ye all in the same category;
Duller than prisons and grimmer than forts,
Summer resorts, summer resorts!

Summer resorts, summer resorts,
Airily vaunting your climate and sports:
Boating and bathing and fishing and sailing,
Promising blithely and cheerfully failing;
Meadowland golf links and mud tennis courts—
Summer resorts, summer resorts!

Summer resorts, summer resorts,
Your commissariat appetite thwarts;
Menus of length that is almost incredible,
High-sounding dishes that prove quite inedible
(Nothing at all served in pints or in quarts)—
Summer resorts, summer resorts!

Summer resorts, summer resorts,
Wildly I flee thy piazza cohorts!
Who, with continuous giggle and chatter,
In wooden rockers eternally clatter;
Veiled innuendoes and caustic retorts—
Summer resorts, summer resorts!

Summer resorts, summer resorts,
Though to enjoy thee my neighbor exhorts,
Deep in my heart there is nothing but pity
For poor wights who "have to get out of the city!"
I am not fooled by their glowing reports,
Summer resorts, summer resorts!
—Carolyn Wells.

Brer Rabbit's Skin.

In recent years several kinds of fur, formerly of so little value as to offer no inducement to the trapper, have increased in price, and consequently collecting them has been made profitable.

Rabbit pelts, which are extensively used by hat-makers, are among these products. Formerly rabbit skins were of virtually no value; country boys who eagerly sought the lair of the skunk and the raccoon and who were even able to sell squirrel skins, thought so little of the rabbit and made so little effort to dispose of the skins that they were seldom used except to form a pad on which they "knuckled down" in the marble game.

Now, however, rabbit skins are worth something, and the country boy who will devote this winter to saving and marketing the skins of the rabbits he kills should make a comfortable sum of money.

One big Eastern firm has announced that it will need 10,000,000 rabbit skins during 1920. The skins are usually sold by the pound, which will contain seven or eight skins.

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Williams have announced the engagement of their daughter, Miss Florence Williams, and Mr. Henry Swift of Berkeley. Their marriage will take place next Thursday at the bride's home in Piedmont.

The marriage of Miss Louise Howard, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Paxton Howard, and Mr. Howard Bouquet of Los Angeles was solemnized Saturday afternoon in Piedmont. Mrs. Guy Gilchrist was her sister's matron of honor and the bridesmaids were Miss Virginia Crane and Miss Katherine Craft. Mr. Allen Holubar was the best man. At the conclusion of their wedding trip Mr. and Mrs. Bouquet will make their home in Hollywood.

A quiet wedding, of considerable interest both here and abroad, was solemnized September 18th at the Church of the Advent, Fell Street, at 10 a. m., when Mrs. Louise E. Frank, widow of Mr. Marshall A. Frank, became the bride of Mr. Frederick Charles Brewer, a graduate of Liverpool College, England, and a former officer of the British army. phia). The Rev. Father Kincaid officiated. The bride was attended by Miss Angela Coyle. Mr. David K. Shanks supported the groom. Mr. Brewer served throughout the Griqualand rebellion with the Griqualand Horse and during the Boer war with the Imperial Light Horse. In the recent world war he served in the Royal Engineers with the Canadian overseas forces. He is internationally known as a polo player, having represented South Africa, and as a yachtsman. The honeymoon will be spent in an automobile trip through Southern California.

The marriage of Miss Dorothy Mann and Mr. Innes Randolph of New York took place September 10th in Yokohama. Mrs. Randolph is the daughter of Mr. Seth Mann and Mrs. Maud Daulton Mann. Mr. Randolph is the son of Mrs. Marion Randolph of New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Hays Smith gave a dinner Friday evening in honor of Miss Geraldine Graham of Santa Barbara and her fiancé, Mr. Whitney Warren, Jr., of New York. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence McCreery, Mr. and Mrs. William Parrott, Mr. and Mrs. Mayo Newhall, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Vincent, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Blyth, Mr. and Mrs. Nion Tucker, Mrs. Christian de Guigné, Mrs. Jane Selby Hayne, Miss Cornelia Clappett, Miss Eleanor Spreckels, Miss Anne Peters, Miss Helen Garritt, Miss Katherine Ramsay, Mr. Donald Lewis, Mr. Richard Schwerin, Mr. Orel Goldarena, Mr. Howard Spreckels, Commander J. L. Nielson, Captain Ronald Banon, Mr. Harry Hunt, Mr. James Jackman, Mr. Cyril McNear, and Mr. Stephen Parrott.

Miss Mary Phelan entertained delightfully at her Washington Street home on Thursday, the 2d, with a musical and tea. With Mr. Fred Maurer at the piano, Miss Grace Ewing, the artist of the afternoon, presented a programme of French folk songs that was charming and unusual. The music room was a perfect setting for her picturesque Breton peasant costume, which is a replica of one at the Trocadero in Paris. There were groups of famous French folk songs and some of the simpler ones of France today, those sung and danced by the children of that country. Informal explanation of the numbers added greatly to their enjoyment. After the programme a delightful half-hour at the tea-tables followed.

Miss Laura Miller was the guest of honor at a luncheon given Friday at the Ingleside Golf and Country Club by Mrs. John Sutton. The guests included Mrs. Blair Brooks, Miss Elizabeth Magee, Miss Jean Searles, Miss Frances Pringle, Miss Eleanor Campbell, Miss Sophia Brownell, Miss Newell Bull, Miss Katherine Stoney, Miss Katherine Bentley, Miss Margaret Buckbee, Miss Josephine Moore, Miss Margaret Cheney, Miss Annette Rolph, Miss Helen St. Goar, Miss Patience Winchester, Miss Frances Lent, Miss Katherine Session, Miss Harriet Campbell, and Miss Betty Merrill.

An Italian fête was held Saturday evening at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Stetson at Burlingame, the affair having been given for the benefit of the American Academy at Rome. Preceding the fête a "no host" dinner for more than a hundred guests was held at the Burlingame Club.

Miss Mary Julia Crocker entertained at luncheon Friday, complimenting Miss Elizabeth Adams. Among the guests were Mrs. Henry White, Jr., Mrs. Andrew Carrigan, Jr., Mrs. Marshall Madison, Mrs. Horace Van Sicken, Mrs. William Kent, Jr., Miss Vere de Vere Adams, Miss Evelyn Poett, Miss Doris Schmiedel, Miss Betty Schmiedel, Miss Gertrude Clark, Miss Aileen McIntosh, Miss Ruth Hobart, Miss Amanda McNear, Miss Anne Dibblee, and Miss Mary Emma Flood.

Mrs. John Wright was a luncheon hostess Saturday in honor of Mrs. Crawford Clarke. The affair was held at the Woman's Athletic Club and those asked to the affair included Mrs. Adam Grant, Mrs. M. C. Porter, Mrs. James Black, Mrs. Charles Deering, Mrs. A. N. Buchanan, Mrs. F. C. McCreary, Mrs. Walter Scott Franklin, Mrs. James Hall, Mrs. George Tyson, Mrs. Charles Crocker, Mrs. M. P. Jones, Mrs. Arthur Sharp, Mrs. William Shotwell, Mrs. Forrest Carey, Mrs. William Ireland, and Miss Linda Buchanan.

Mason of Vermont, the guests including Mrs. Duncan McDuffie, Mrs. Voorhies Bishop, Mrs. Erle Brownell, Mrs. James Bishop, Mrs. Grayson Dutton, Mrs. Harry Williar, Mrs. Samuel Boardman, Mrs. Frank Griffin, Mrs. Robert McMillan, Mrs. Frederick Magee, Mrs. Andrew Welch, Mrs. James Black, and Miss Bessie Palmer.

Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Sprickels gave a dinner last Wednesday evening for Mrs. William Miller Graham of Santa Barbara, Miss Geraldine Graham, and Mr. Whitney Warren, Jr., of New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Ames gave a dinner Thursday evening in Burlingame, their guests including Miss Helen Hammersmith, Miss Evelyn Poett, Miss Lillian Hopkins, Miss Dorothy Clark, Miss Edna Christenson, Miss Sue McDonald, Miss Florence Russell, Mr. Merrill Morshead, Mr. Calvin Tilden, Mr. Alan Black, Mr. Lindsay Howard, Mr. George Kleiser, Mr. Dana Fuller, and Mr. Edward McDonald.

Mrs. George Beardsley and Miss Barbara Beardsley gave a luncheon last week in San Rafael, complimenting Miss Anne Weatherbee of New York.

Mrs. William McArthur of Los Angeles and Mrs. A. C. Mason of Vermont were the guests of honor at a luncheon given Friday by Mrs. Erle Brownell. Among the guests were Mrs. Frank Fuller, Mrs. Maxwell Milton, Mrs. Grayson Dutton, Mrs. Silas Palmer, Mrs. Harry Williar, Mrs. Voorhies Bishop, and Mrs. Samuel Boardman.

Senator James D. Phelan gave a luncheon Sunday at Saratoga.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Stetson gave a supper-dance last Thursday evening, their guests including Mr. and Mrs. Platt Kent, Mr. and Mrs. Wilder Bowers, Mr. and Mrs. William Parrott, Mr. and Mrs. Marshall Madison, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Schuyler, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Clark, Jr.,

Mr. and Mrs. Howard Park, Mr. and Mrs. Algeron Gibson, Miss Evelyn Poett, Miss Ruth Hobart, Miss Elizabeth Adams, Miss Katherine Kuhn, Miss Mary Elena Macondray, Miss Evelyn Barron, Miss Betty Folger, Miss Elena Folger, Miss Frances Pringle, Miss Anne Dibblee, Miss Emily Timlow, Miss Florence Russell, Miss Sophie Beylard, Miss Lillian Hopkins, Miss Gertrude Clark, Miss Margaret Lee, Miss Rosamunde Lee, Miss Helen Pierce, and Miss Mary Emma Flood.

Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., of New York were the guests of honor at a dinner given Saturday evening in Burlingame by Mr. and Mrs. Nion Tucker.

Annual Reception of the Protestant Old Ladies' Home.

The thirty-first annual reception and donation party of the Protestant Episcopal Old Ladies Home will be held on the afternoon of Friday, October 1st—from 2 to 6—at the home, 2158 Golden Gate Avenue, San Francisco. This institution continues the good work it has long maintained, and has within its fold thirty-one beneficiaries, the full number that may be housed in its limited quarters. The advanced cost of everything essential to the maintenance of the home makes it necessary for the managers to make special appeal this year to the humanity and generosity of the public. Following is a list of the board of directors of the home: Mrs. A. L. House, president; Mrs. W. M. Fitzhugh, vice-president; Mrs. S. B. McNear, recording secretary; Mrs. J. H. Philip, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Warren D. Clark, treasurer; Mrs. J. K. Armsby, Mrs. A. S. Baldwin, Mrs. H. J. Crocker, Mrs. George W. Caswell, Mrs. B. M. Gunn, Mrs. A. B. Hammond, Mrs. Lewis P. Hobart, Mrs. N. L. Nokes, Mrs. James Ruggles, Mrs. George Reed.

Domestic Science School.

A domestic science school conducted for the women of San Francisco and vicinity by the Sperry Flour Company is to be opened for its sixth annual course on September 27th.

In lessons personally conducted by Mrs. Belle DeGraf, well-known domestic science expert, the science and practice of cookery in all its branches will be treated from the standpoint of those who desire to understand its fundamental principles. It will also be endeavored to promote originality and inventiveness in getting up the daily menu and preparing appetizing dishes. There are no fees attached to the course, which consists of twelve lessons, one each week.

Special Tea Event.

The Hotel Whitcomb is planning to give a series of the most delightful tea events ever staged for the enjoyment of San Francisco women. Each of these teas has been arranged to include some new and distinctly worthwhile entertainment.

The first of this series of teas will be a "Dramatic Tea" held on Tuesday afternoon, September 28th, in the picturesque Sun Lounge of the Hotel Whitcomb. During this tea a dramatic reading will be given on the subject, "Humoresque," by Fannie Hurst.

Miss Florence Lutz, formerly on the faculty of the Sargent School of Acting, New York City, has been engaged to give the reading. Miss Lutz has acted with Forbes Robertson,

"What's new?"

"Hotel Whitcomb is giving a 'Dramatic Tea' next Tuesday afternoon here in the Sun Lounge. It's going to be very interesting."

"What's the dramatic part of the tea?"

"Why, Miss Lutz of the University of California will give a reading of 'Humoresque,' Fannie Hurst's clever play."

"Ob, I must bear it! The pictures were so good. When is it going to be?"

"Tuesday afternoon, September 28th, in the Sun Lounge, 2:30 to 4:30, but I'm told the reading commences at four. There's no admission charge."

Bacon—I see a folding drum for orchestra musicians has been invented that is extended to full size by hinged ribs between the heads. Egbert—That sounds good to me. Bacon—What? Egbert—A drum you can shut up.—Yonkers Statesman.

"We are still seeking," said the scientist, "to ascertain the exact purpose for which the pyramids of Egypt were constructed." "Yes," replied Senator Sorghum, absent-mindedly; "some of these investigations do take a long time."—Washington Star.

Wilson and Wilton were discussing the moralities when the first put this question: "Well, what is conscience, anyhow?" "Conscience," said Wilton, who prides himself upon being a bit of a pessimist, "is the thing we always believe should bother the other fellow."—Toledo Blade.

Browne—I witnessed a wonderful act last night—a man juggling fifteen silver dollars while balancing a ten-dollar bill on the tip of his nose and giving an impersonation at the same time. Toane—Marvelous! By the way, whom did he impersonate? Browne—The salaried man, of course.—Life.

Little Girl—Teacher said today that our ancestors away back were monkeys. Mother—You don't believe that, do you? Little Girl—Well, I don't know much about it, but I told the teacher that maybe it wasn't so far Director—Did you or did you not tell the camera man yesterday that I had the biggest feet of any human being you had ever seen? Leading Man—I did not. I merely said that if you would take your shoes off you would be half undressed.—Film Fun.

"You've got indigestion; that's what's the matter with you," said the doctor. "Oh, that's what it is, then?" inquired the patient. "That's it. You've been eating a lot of meat, I suppose?" "I have; yes." "Well, now you're paying for it." "Would you mind telling my butcher that, doctor?"—Yonkers Statesman.

Valerianian—I've got cirrhosis of the liver, an incipient caruncle on my neck, inflammation of the duodenum, septic sore throat, and general prostration. Sympathetic Friend—Well, and how are you?—Punch.

Executive ability has been variously defined, but the following from an executive with a sense of humor seems to cover the whole subject. He said: "Executive ability is the ability to hire some one to do work for which you will get the credit, and, if there is a slip-up, having some one at whose door to lay the blame."—New York Evening Post.

Goat Island as a Railroad Terminal.

The Argonaut notes with interest Admiral Jayne's revival of the old project of making Goat Island a common terminal for the several railroads entering San Francisco at her eastern gate. The inception of this idea is so far back in our history that nobody knows in what mind it originally developed. Again and again it has been brought forward, but always to encounter insurmountable difficulties.

Goat Island is a tract of 144 acres, and it might be much enlarged by the easy process of filling in an area of submerged land which lies immediately to the north. Thus enlarged there would be space enough for all demands. The approach to Goat Island from the east is through shoal water, where bridging would be easy and relatively inexpensive. Connection between the island and the San Francisco water-front is of course practicable by ferry, or it might be accomplished more advantageously through a tube running under the ship channel. The advantages would be many, including shortening the transcontinental trip by ten minutes, rapid and cheap transit between the two cities of the Bay with elimination of costly ferry systems. There are no engineering problems, and the question of finance would not be serious, since the railroads would no doubt be glad to take over that phase of the project.

The serious fact is the government's ownership of the island and its chronic unwillingness to part with any property to which it has established title. Theoretically the island is held as a resource of military defense. Practically this theory has not a leg to stand on. The government has made no attempt to fortify the island, and it would be useless to do so, since there are many other points of greater strategic advantage. The uses to which the island is now being put by the government are trivial. The Naval Training Station is badly placed there. Its use as the site of lighthouses would not be hindered in the least degree by converting it into a railroad terminal. The argument is all one way and there would seem to be no reason why an administration fairly equipped with common sense could not be brought to consent to such use—the only large use—to which the island is adapted.

In the meantime it is pertinent to remark that there is no new feature in the project as outlined by Admiral Jayne. For more than fifty years it has periodically been under discussion. However, the matter grows in importance with process of time and development of transportation needs; and being of such importance to San Francisco and to the whole state, every friendly word spoken for it is deserving of appreciation.

The Presidential Campaign to Date.

With the day of election something less than five weeks ahead the prospect is for the heaviest landslide in history. The tremendous Harding majority in Maine is not even a fair indication of what is to happen in every other state outside of Dixie. A famous political observer, whose judgments are singularly free from partisan feeling, after visiting all sections of the country informs the Argonaut that "the dislocation indicated in Maine will be even more marked in the other states." "Make choice," he declares, "of any state outside of the solid South for a bet on Cox, and it will be safe to take the Harding end." All this, of course, is relative to the situation as it stands today. It is possible for a change to come, but if Harding carries himself as well as he has so far any change in the situation is likely to be in his favor. That he will do this is a practical assurance. He grows steadily in power as a campaigner. For example, his address at Baltimore on Monday, in which he addressed himself to the subjects of after-war adjustment and an American marine, was, if not best of the whole series, at least up to the high mark of what has preceded it. Manifestly Senator Harding is a man of reserved power as assuredly he is one familiar with the affairs of the country and not afraid to speak his mind.

The Democratic National Committee is disorganized, disgusted, and poverty-stricken. In truth, it is without hope and has all but abandoned any real effort in behalf of Cox and Roosevelt, whose doom is plainly foreseen. Under the circumstances the fight on the presidency and that on the league of nations issue are thrust into the background and the organized energies of the party have been transferred to the senatorial contests. Here positive and effective work is being done by the Senatorial Committee under the chairmanship of Senator Walsh of Montana, with headquarters at Chicago. Walsh and his associates of the Senatorial Committee are active in all the Republican factional contests in various states, notably in Missouri, Indiana, Utah, and Illinois, and are endeavoring to translate these disturbances into votes for Democratic candidates for the Senate. Nobody knows what the resources of Senator Walsh's committee are or what sums it is spending. But plainly its affairs are in better shape than those of the National Committee. It has obviously raised much money in Indiana, where the Democratic candidate is a very rich man. It has very plainly the approval and support of the Administration, which is now more interested in the senatorial contests than in the Cox and Roosevelt campaign. It is to be observed that whenever Secretary Baker or other members of the President's official family now appear in the campaign it is in states where a senatorial fight is on. The effort is to salvage the Senate, and it is not a hopeless task.

In the meantime the league of nations issue is not having smooth sailing. In Republican ranks the irreconcilables are definitely opposed to the Root plan of an International Court of Justice. Senator Borah insists that such a court, chosen by the existing league, would be a political court. On the other hand, a very large number of anti-league senators—and Senator Harding is fairly to be reckoned among them—see merit in the Root plan as a means of compromise. Mr. Root returned from Europe on Sunday, but declined upon landing to make any statement about anything more vital than the state of the weather. It is, however, to be expected that he will very shortly set forth the results of his mission with his general views upon the league and other matters, and that when thus set forth his ideas will be made the basis of Republican policy in the closing weeks of the campaign.

If it be a merit to persist in a project or method of campaign after the ineffectiveness of that method has been demonstrated, then Governor Cox is fairly entitled to a measure of commendation. He persists in his campaign of assault upon Senator Harding as a beneficiary of a colossal "slush fund" in face of the fact that the Senate Investigating Committee, after hearing evidence from all available sources, has been unable to discover either the $30,000,000 fund or the $15,000,000 fund or even the $8,000,000 fund as charged for the Harding campaign. In so far as the investigation has unearthed anything in the way of facts they reflect rather upon the Democratic than upon the Republican organization. But the committee has failed to discover any evidence that either side has employed money in sums great or small in illegitimate or questionable ways. Thus the Cox charges have fallen flat. Yet Governor Cox continues to make them the basis of his spielings wherever he goes.

The league of nations bears the marks of a decaying organization. True, twenty-nine nations have nominally subscribed to its charter. But their commitments are perfunctory and far from implying confidence in the league or dependence upon it. When it is remembered that the United States stands wholly aloof, that the policies of both England and France proceed in disregard of it, it becomes evident that it is without vitality or authority. The real basis of its existence today is to be found in the large fund placed at its disposal by member nations and employed chiefly in payment of charges—including salaries—all adjusted upon a truly royal scale. It is to be suspected that within a year or two it will be found that the whole function of the league has been to serve as an international convention to nominate members of a Court of International Justice, and that when it has made its nominations in the manner prescribed by the Root plan, like other nominating conventions it will automatically die. Surely it will die whenever the nations that have entered into it, finding that it achieves nothing for their interests, shall cease to put up money for its expenses.

The Irish Hyphen.

The proposal by Mr. Oswald Villard to set up a volunteer jury of one hundred representative Americans to investigate the affairs of the Irish is of a piece with other activities in this country assuming to deal with British-Irish affairs. It is nothing more or less than rank impertinence. The affairs of Britain and Ireland are not our affairs, and any activity or any proposal to meddle with them is without warrant.

contempt of neutral obligations, out of propriety, out of order. An American may in a way sympathize with the earnestness and enthusiasm of the Irish in Ireland with respect to what they deem to be a patriotic cause. It is their own business, and in dealing with it they assume personal risks that may at least be credited to their courage, however it may reflect upon their discretion. But in the case of the American-Irish the matter presents an entirely different aspect, without justification in any political or other obligation. In stimulating rebellion in Ireland, with its possible consequences to those who rush into direct action, they incur no risks. Whatever may happen to others in consequence of their activities, nothing can happen to them, for as soon as they make trouble, unfailingly they fall back for protection upon their American citizenship. It is only the other day that the late ex-President Roosevelt and other patriots were condemning in unmeasured terms, and with universal approval and entire justice, the German hyphen in this country. All that was then said applies now with equal point to the Irish hyphen. There is unfortunately no means by which we may deal with the American-Irish agitator as he deserves. But at least he has the contempt of all right-thinking American men and women, who fail not to resent use of American citizenship to shield their enmity and pestiferous activity in relation to British policy in Ireland.

Obregon's Plans.

Obregon is a bold promiser. "I will try," he said in a recent interview, "to surround myself with men of experience and ideas. My ministers will be selected for ability and will have full responsibility. They will be real ministers, not merely figureheads as during the Carranza régime." Continuing, Obregon declared that "the most serious problem that confronts the government of Mexico is financial. The debts of the country are most pressing. We will pay our debts as far as possible, and will arrange for means ultimately to meet every obligation."

Among other assurances on the part of Obregon is a pledge of friendship to the United States. There is reason for it. The imperative need of Mexico for rehabilitation, both governmental and industrial, is for aid from outside capital. Only one country in the world is in position to supply such aid; Japan might do it if she were permitted, but is barred by the Monroe Doctrine and by general American policy. The United States is practically the only country from which Mexico can hope to obtain money, and the only way to gain credit in the United States is first to establish domestic order, then to provide assurances of good intentions and of ability to pay. Knowing all this, we may easily believe that Obregon will make it a first object of his policy to conciliate American friendship and coöperation.

Like most Mexicans of the political type, Obregon up to two years ago was ignorant of pretty much everything outside his own country. He was never out of Mexico until the year 1918, when he came to Los Angeles, then to San Francisco, then to the cities of the East, including Washington. On this trip he saw and learned much to his frank amazement. Until then he had no conception of the extent and power of American resource. It was borne in upon him that the Mexican theory of American fear of Mexico, long cherished by himself and others of his type, was mistaken and delusive. In the course of his visit to Washington, where he went to exchange certain Mexican products for American goods, he fell in with Mr. Hoover, to whom the question of buying what Obregon had to offer had been referred. Hoover saw the opportunity to instruct his visitor and to reconstruct his ideas with respect to American potentialities. Under an arrangement promoted by Hoover, Obregon made a tour of government works in and about Washington, and of the greater industrial establishments of the Atlantic states. What he saw far outran his previous conceptions, and he frankly confessed that he had had no idea of the organized capabilities of the country. He was further impressed by the tremendous achievements of the government in bringing some five or six millions of men under arms and under military discipline, and he got that which was further good for him to know in the demonstration of American fighting qualities as illustrated in the closing months of the war in the French battle zone.

The effect of all this is manifest in Obregon's present attitude. He knows that the United States has dallied with his country, not through fear, not through lack of capacity to deal with it overwhelmingly, but in consequence of other motives. He knows that the United States may at any time overwhelm Mexico by adopting an aggressive policy. He knows that the salvation of Mexico is dependent upon good relations with the United States. And knowing all this, he will in so far as he may adjust his policies to the need of creating and of establishing credit here.

Of Obregon's pacific intentions we have not the first doubt. As to his ability to do what he has set out to do there is less assurance. He has to deal with a disorganized and demoralized people, with conditions all but chaotic, with treason at home, with discredit abroad. He hopes to overcome all these obstacles and has set himself to the task of doing it. That he will succeed is doubtful. The task may be too great. Not upon good intentions, not upon mere promises, can we yet abandon the conviction that only by force from without—from the United States—may Mexico be pacified and restored.

A Light-Headed Proposal.

It will be the part of wisdom to refrain from getting excited over the President's attitude in the matter of the Shipping Board legislation until all the facts, including the legal considerations involved, shall be made clear. Congress is by no means infallible. Before now—and many times—it has enacted laws impracticable of enforcement; and it may be that in the immediate case there are reasons either in law or in discretion supporting the Executive's action. If there are such they have yet to be revealed, but it will be the part of prudence to wait for the facts.

In the meantime a proposal by Representative Edmonds of Pennsylvania to arraign President Wilson in impeachment proceedings is precipitate to the degree of light-headedness. Even the President's most positive critics would regard such a course with disfavor. President Wilson has done many wrong things in the past seven years. His attitude in the immediate case is among the least of many illegal assumptions of authority and of illegal neglects of duty. After having suffered what the country has endured at his hands for nearly eight years and then to bring it into impeachment proceedings in the closing months of his term would be a striking and stupid inconsistency.

Furthermore, if Mr. Edmonds or anybody else were set to attract to the President the sympathies of the country it could not be more effectively done than to present impeachment charges at this time. Whatever the case, however he may be blameworthy, Mr. Wilson is a very sick man. That he is physically infirm is admitted. That he is mentally unpoised and incompetent is evident. To bring a man in Mr. Wilson's condition to trial under impeachment would involve a pathetic exhibition, the effect of which upon the public mind would be all one way—all to Mr. Wilson's advantage.

Mr. Wilson ought to have retired from the presidency a year ago, when his condition became such as to make attention to the business of his office impracticable. But he did not do it, and even now, when he is obviously a physical and mental wreck, he holds to powers that should be in sound and sane hands. But bad as the situation is the country would better endure it to the end of the pending term rather than to take action that would assuredly end in futility and scandal.

"A Dead Issue."

To what extent the issue of prohibition may control the action of individual voters it is not possible to know in advance of the election. Indeed we may never know, since the matter is so involved with other things that the result of the election may defy analysis. The situation is not to the liking of the fanatical prohibitionist, who does not find in either Harding or Cox a representative of his ideas, and he can but know that a vote for the Prohibition candidate is a vote wasted.

Mr. Cox has declared that he will enforce the Volstead Act, but this pledge is not assuring when it is recalled that in his three gubernatorial campaigns in Ohio he had the support, not merely of the "wets," but of large interests that have made enormous profits out of distilling and from the saloon business. It is further to be remembered that he was nominated by a combination of political bosses, including Boss Murphy of Tammany Hall and Tom Taggart of Indiana, whose policies have always been and still are identified with the liquor interests.

Senator Harding, while not in any way affiliated with "wet" interests, is not a fanatical prohibitionist. He spoke against the Eighteenth Amendment in the Senate, finally voting for it as a means of putting an end to an anti-patriotic agitation at a time when all the energies of the country were essential to prosecution of the war. It is of record that some years ago he made a small subscription to the capital stock of a local brewery in Marion, Ohio, not because of sympathy with the liquor business, but to the end of aiding a movement to increase the manufacturing interest of his home town. Mr. Harding is as far as possible from being a drinking man in the ordinary sense of that term, but he is not a teetotaler and he makes no concealment of liberal views. Broadly speaking, he is friendly to all moral aims and movements, including temperance as he understands it. He stands precisely as do most men of sense and moderation as distinct from extremists and cranks.

Governor Cox seeks to evade the issue of prohibition by the declaration that prohibition is "a dead issue." If in this view of the matter he is sincere, he writes himself down a man of limited understanding. Prohibition is far from being a dead issue. Is an issue that commands the interested attention of nine-tenths of the people of the country to be called dead? Can any condition that in the present posture of American life and regarded as an issue, makes technical criminals or one-half of the population of the country be called dead? In truth the issue of prohibition is very much alive. If as matters stand today prohibition has not a definite status in the campaign it is not because there is lacking the element of popular interest or the potentialities that abide in suppressed judgment. We venture the declaration that in the country today there are five persons having vital interest in prohibition to one who is seriously concerned with the league of nations. Whoever declares prohibition a dead issue is a person of small vision and of little understanding of the temperament or spirit of the American people.

Editorial Notes.

At Keith's Vaudeville Theatre at Washington Thursday night of last week a monologist, one Al Raymond scored a hit in a manner that illustrates the political temper of the Capital City. Posing as a statesman Raymond remarked:

"Well, Cox will be in the White House after the 4th of March"—

There was very mild applause.

—"that is," went on Raymond, "if Harding invite him."

The house rocked with applause.

"Now," said Raymond, "I know how to bet."

Fortunately for the world at large, earth and sky owe no allegiance to Article X, nor to the portentous forebodings of Mr. Wilson. A corn crop of 3,131,000,000 bushels, the greatest in history, with a normal crop of wheat and cotton, a record tobacco crop, and almost a record crop of oats, potatoes, rye, sugar beets, beans and rice, reveals a situation in which no pessimism lurks. "Business as usual" shines clearly through the September crop report, and it is good business, for these kindly fruits of the earth are food and raiment. Government by phraseology can not diminish their significance, illusions of language can not impair their value. Our crops will do more for Europe than all Mr. Wilson's theories combined. The heart of the world will not break just yet, for free institutions and neighborly agreements thrive on food better than on armed camp and hungry alliances.

Mr. Ford is an obvious crank, but there is in him a streak of shrewdness. At the point of getting publicity for himself and the wares he manufactures he has positive genius. True, the kind of publicity he gets is of a kind which a man of taste would take care to avoid none the less it serves Mr. Ford's purposes. We do not find it easy to believe that Mr. Ford's recent sensational cut in the prices of his automobile is other than an advertising device. But, whatever the motive, Mr. Ford has done a good thing. It was time that some body should remind the country that it was going daff in the matter of prices for all things, and time to call halt. That Mr. Ford has called it effectively is evident in the fact that automobile makers everywhere are tumbling over each other to announce reductions. In this rush to lower the prices of motor machines there is a sufficient demonstration that the motor makers have been doing their full share in the general game of profiteering. If today automobiles are made and sold at a profit anywhere from 10 to 25 per cent. lower than recent prices, then recent prices have been too high. Now it is to be hoped some other bold iconoclast, let it be for advertising purposes or what not, may do in the sphere of general trading what Mr. Ford has done in the automobile world. Prices for everything are too high—illegitimately, absurdly too high. There can be no possible justification for current prices of food, clothing, and pretty much everything else. There is flagrant demoralization in a wage scale that permits extravagance and waste and discourages thrift. Illegitimate prices, illegitimate profits, illegitimate wages are very obviously deteriorating the moral fibre of the country. It is high time to call a halt.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Pertinent Questions.

SANTA CRUZ, CAL., September 20, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: The nominee of the Democratic party uses a hair trigger always in blaming his political opponents. Any suspected mote, no matter how tiny, in a Republican eye becomes a veritable Niagara of a cataract after treatment by Old Doctor Cox, but a beam in a Democratic eye afflicts him with astigmatism, even if of sufficient size and strength to support the Woolworth Building or to hase St. Peter's at Rome.

While unsavory either of odor or in consumption, since Governor Cox has assumed the attitude of the Parisee and interjected mud-slinging in this campaign after running dry of argument will he answer a few leading and pertinent questions as to the why and wherefore of certain happenings in our conduct of the war, for which the Democratic party must be responsible, since they were in complete and undisputed possession and control of the entire machinery of government when they occurred?

Why was it that although almost a billion of the people's money was supposedly spent in aircraft, practically never an American plane either reached or flew over our lines in France?

Why was it that while we mobilized but 4,000,000 men to England's 7,500,000, France's 7,500,000, and Italy's 5,500,000, our daily expenditure in the war was four times that of England, six times that of France, and ten times that of Italy?

Why was it that although we spent approximately $3,000,000,000 for 20,000 guns and howitzers and the ammunition to supply them, only seventy-two guns and but 20,000 shells ever reach our firing lines? Of the seventy-two guns that reached France forty-eight are known to have been built before the war.

Why was it found necessary to purchase—

Ten pairs of shoes for each man mobilized?

Twelve saddles for every cavalry horse in service?

Seven halters, four horse brushes, and three horse covers for each and every animal?

Did every officer of ordnance require every one of the thirty-six pairs of spurs that were purchased for them?

Could our farmers find use for the 145,000 branding irons with which the War Department credits them with being supplied?

Was economy in governmental expenditure furthered by spending some millions for ambulance harnesses when that service was rendered entirely by motors?

Has Governor Cox anything to say in extenuation, explanation, or excuse of the infamous and vicious "cost plus" that was insisted on by the Democratic Secretary of War in the face of repeated congressional protests?

The "cost plus" system of sand-hogging the people's money out of the treasury was used in constructing the army training camps. The work was done on contract, the contractor receiving 10 per cent. (later slightly reduced) on the total cost of the work to the government. It is obvious, therefore, that the more the work cost, the more there was in it for the contractor. That the contractors were able to see on which side of the bread the butter was spread without use of a magnifying glass the extravagant cost of these camps proves. It reached the enormous total of $1,200,000,000, and it has been estimated that at least a third of this money was absolutely wasted.

There's lots more of it both here and abroad, but this should be sufficient to go on.

There is, however, one question more which Governor Cox may wish to answer, as his interest in it is both peculiar and direct. He also may especially wish to answer it, since in one of his Oakland speeches he laid great stress on the necessity to save physical suffering as the compelling reason for his having, as governor of Ohio taken direct action and seized coal in transit through that state; coal that was either the property of or under direct control of the Federal government.

The justice and wisdom of this action of Governor Cox has never been called into question, but if he could put his power as governor to such arbitrary use against the Federal government, could he not also have used it to improve the notoriously wretched and disgraceful conditions in the training camps in the State of Ohio; conditions that were intolerable and proved disastrous to our soldiers?

While Mr. Cox was governor Camp Sherman, at Chillicothe in that state, was built.

Why was it that the hospital, sanitary, and heating facilities in this camp were so inadequate under and because of the "cost plus" system of construction that they caused an epidemic of pneumonia there to increase to such proportions that at one time no less than one thousand dead bodies of soldiers were stacked up in sheets for want of coffins in which to enclose them?

JAMES G. BLAINE.

Concerning Presidential Qualifications.

SAN FRANCISCO, September 22, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I have carefully read your editorial in last week's Argonaut on the necessary qualifications of a President of the United States. I believe that his should be a keener vision, a holder spirit than the people's whom he represents, because of the very fact that he has been chosen by them to be their leader. I also think it essential that he be not lacking entirely in the quality of imagination. Every great soldier, statesman, and scientist has had it in some degree.

The merely practical man has never done much for himself nor for the world, and we very promptly forget him. We revere the memory of our Washington and Lincoln because they were animated by the highest ideals and they were fortunate in being able to carry out their ideals and thus enrich mankind.

I believe that we are often slaves to conservatism. We fear the untried and cling to the old although it shackle us. Despite this fact, we advance. It is not so very long ago that insects, such as locusts, and domestic animals were solemnly tried in the law courts by famous judges who appointed no less famous lawyers to defend them, the first for having devastated the farmers' crops, the second for having committed murder. Indeed it was no uncommon thing to see a dog or pig dangling from a gibbet in order to serve as a warning to the rest of his kind. The belief in witches and changelings has also died hard.

I do not think that either Cox or Harding was nominated by the majority of his party. Harding, "a dark horse," owes his candidacy to reactionary senators; Cox his to the unscrupulous element in the Democratic party. Since the Republican nominee has been in the Senate he has fathered but one bill of importance.

In Sir James G. Frazer's lecture on the "Scope of Social Anthropology" he expresses a thought which fits in perfectly when referring to the league of nations. He says: "The more we study the inward workings of society and the progress of civilization, the more clearly shall we perceive how both are governed by the influence of thoughts which, springing up at first we know not how or whence in a few superior minds, gradually spread till they have leavened the whole inert lump of a community or of mankind. . . . In the mental sphere the struggle for existence is not less fierce than in the physical, but in the end the better ideas, which we call the truth, carry the day. The clamorous opposition with which at their first appearance they are regularly greeted, whenever they conflict with old prejudices, may retard but can not prevent their final victory. It is the practice of the mob first to stone and then to erect useless memorials to their greatest benefactors. All who set themselves to replace ancient error and superstition by truth and reason must lay their account with brickbats in their life and a marble monument after death. . . . On the whole the men of keenest intelligence and strongest characters lead the rest and shape the moulds into which, outwardly at least, society is cast. As such men are necessarily few by comparison with the multitude whom they lead, it follows that the community is really dominated by the will of an enlightened minority even in countries where the ruling power is nominally vested in the hands of the numerical majority. In fact, disguise it as we may, the government of mankind is always and everywhere essentially aristocratic. However it may seem to lead, the dull-witted majority in the end follows a keener-witted minority. That is its salvation and the secret of progress."

Chinese in the War.

UNION CLUB.

VICTORIA, B. C., September 20, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: May I correct a mistake of fact in Mr. James G. Blaine's letter in your issue of September 11th? The Allies did not make use of 250,000 coolies behind the lines in France and Belgium. The total number recruited by the British was barely 100,000. In France they were divided into 196 companies whose nominal strength was 476 Chinese and twenty-four whites (including five officers). These men were recruited principally through British missionary influences, who were frequently opposed by local official Chinese. As to the attitude of Peking I am not informed, nor would it practically, in modern China, make much difference.

The first company left the depot on May 1, 1917, and they kept coming till the spring of 1918. It was intended originally to recruit 150,000, but owing partly to shortage of shipping only about 100,000 were sent.

They were better fed, better clothed, better paid, and better treated than they ever had been before in their lives, and their families received a separation allowance. They did an immense amount of necessary work at a time when every Britisher who was physically able was in the combatant forces, and it is doubtful if we could have carried on without them. They were all voluntarily recruited on civil contracts and were glad to come, as many of them had worked for Britishers in South Africa and knew they would get a square deal. I had several ex-South Africans.

Most of them came from Shan Tung and were shipped from Tsing Dan. The remainder came from Che-Li and were, with a few from Tien Tsin, shipped from Wei Hai Wei. The French obtained from 10,000 to 15,000 independently from Tien Tsin, who were looked after by Catholic missionaries.

Several of my friends and acquaintances were engaged in the recruiting. I was attached to the Chinese Labor Corps in July, 1917, and commanded a company till demobilization. So I know whereof I speak. . . .

CAPTAIN H. W. R. MOORE.

It is to be hoped that the fresh attempt to scale Mount Everest, announced by Sir Francis Younghusband at the anniversary meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, will prove more successful than those made in the past. The difficulties are great, because the natives inhabiting the districts round "The Abode of Snow," as they call it, worship the mountain as a god, and regard those who endeavor to reach the summit as guilty of the utmost profanity. But for this it would probably have been scaled long ago, for experts maintain that its ascent might well prove less formidable than that of many peaks already climbed.

Investigations made in several Boston hospitals by Dr. Ellsworth Huntington seem to indicate that for surgical operations the best condition of the atmosphere is high humidity, 80 per cent. or more, directly after operations, and moderate humidity, about 60 per cent., at a temperature of 64 degrees Fahrenheit, a few days later. Dr. Huntington points out that, if these results are accepted, there is no reason why the optimum conditions of temperature and humidity should not be produced artificially in hospitals, causing a probable improvement of not less than 20 per cent. in the results of operations.

Japan has a censorship of movies that really censors, from the censor's point of view. Women must not sit in the same section with men even when accompanied by male companions, and every kiss that appears in the film is ruthlessly chopped out.

"EVIL COMMUNICATIONS."

A usually voracious correspondent tells us that the French people, or at least some of them, are looking with discontent at the functions of the president of the republic. They are comparing them with the powers and the authorities of the President of another republic, our own. They have had the advantages or the disadvantages of personal observation and study. President Wilson came to Paris as the representative of the United States. He stepped at once into the centre of the stage and he remained there. The spot light, with occasional waverings, fell upon him alone. He was hedged around with a ceremonialism, one might say a pageantry, accorded to no other national representative, and suggestive rather of the middle ages than of an epoch of republicanism and democracy. Nothing like it had been seen in Paris since the visit of the Czar of Russia some thirty years ago. Military patrols guarded his headquarters, and even the whole side of the street was held sacred against the profanation of the unauthorized pedestrian. Other statesmen came and went unnoticed, mingling with the common herd, eating and drinking in public, and with no veil of secrecy or mystery to hide their movements. The president of the French Republic took his walks abroad guarded by a single detective—whose ministrations were usually evaded—and he attracted hardly a glance of curiosity. President Poincaré was conspicuous only by his faultless demeanor of reticence, by a certain gracious invisibility that seemed to allay disquiet and never to invoke it. Now we can hardly blame the French nation if they accepted President Wilson as actually and truly the representative of the American people, as their protagonist. What did they know of constitutional limitations or of the extent to which they had been violated? What did they know of the senatorial rights that were being flouted? What did they know of the electoral repudiation of President Wilson that immediately preceded his visit, or of the disgust aroused by a Cæsarian preconsulship so foreign to the spirit of the American people? They knew just as much about our government as we know about theirs; that is to say little or nothing. What they then learned was that the presidency of the sister and senior republic included a certain despotic autocracy which they themselves had associated with a discarded Napoleonism. And because the French are essentially an imperialistic or monarchical people—no matter how hotly such an assertion may be resented—because they love the sensational and the spectacular, as we all do, they had a certain superficial liking for what they saw. And those among them who had autocratic tendencies, and they are numerous, began at once to ask why their own president should have no such powers as those wielded by President Wilson, why their own president should be relegated to a position of formalism and with functions somewhat similar to those of a moderator of a Presbyterian Synod.

There is no French constitution in the sense in which we use that term in America. That is to say there is no single document adopted in its entirety as the basic or organic law of the republic. The French constitution consists of a series of parliamentary enactments passed under the stress of emergency and modified from time to time under the stress of other emergencies. The American constitution marked the beginnings of a nation. It was, in a sense, an effort to create all things new. There were neither traditions nor prejudices nor rivalries nor rancors to stretch out persuasive hands from the past. Even the soil was a new one, and its imperial, and republican by turns. It had seen revolution, and it had seen revolution after revolution, invasion after invasion, and it had just emerged from the bloody bath of the Commune after the crucifixion of Prussian conquest. Every one of these phases had left its mark upon the national character, and within the nation were the many and strong adherents of monarchism, imperialism, republicanism, and communism. The Bourbons and the Bonapartes were alike within and without, while the rest of Europe, divided perhaps between the rival claims of the great houses, was at least unanimous in its hostility to republicanism. It was under such conditions that the National Assembly of 1875 set itself to work to build up the new order of things and to add one more experiment in government to those that had passed. There was one great thing that they knew. All other experiments had ended in bloodshed and ruin. All other government edifices had been built upon the sand and the waters had washed them away. The stench of the German invasion was still upon the lands when the National Assembly was convened. The terror of the Commune had barely passed. Chaos was the most fruitful of all soils for the Bourbon and the Bonaparte. There was no time for prolonged deliberation, and certainly there was no inclination to the elaboration of moral principles.

lofty ethical platitudes. France was unutterably weary. There was none of the enthusiasm of a new birth. Something had to be done, and it had to be done quickly. As a matter of fact the French constitution contains no professions of principles, no declarations of humanitarianism. It does not pretend to establish a new earth or a new heaven. It is not an evangel. The French have their faults, but the dreadful thing that we call idealism is not among them. Hypocrisy is foreign to the French character. The French constitution is as direct and as unemotional as a bank prospectus.

It would obviously be impossible within the present limits to attempt a sketch of the French constitution. It may be doubted if any one but a French jurist could do it satisfactorily. It is not wholly a matter of written laws. As in England, there are many things that are constitutionally lawful, but that are so inexpedient as to be impossible. Theoretically the British king may veto a law, as may the President of the United States. But the British king would not dream of doing such a thing, whereas the President of the United States does it frequently. Our Constitution is not old enough to accept the unwritten modifications dictated by expediency. The French president, for example, has the nominal power to make all civil and military appointments, but in actual practice he appoints only the officials of his own household. There is nothing in France that corresponds with our spoils system, nor indeed is there anything that corresponds with our party system. Parties there certainly are in the French parliament, but they are numerous and loosely knit. They are always liable to break up and to form new combinations. A government majority may change overnight into a government minority, and such a thing as party loyalty is hardly heard of. The government that makes a false step is liable to instant destruction, and one more consonant with what seems to be the public will takes its place without delay and upon the summons of the president. The members of the government are members also of parliament and are constantly liable to interpellation, as in England. A parliamentary censure of a single member of the government may mean the instant overthrow of the whole government, which exists only so long as it can maintain its majority. Party loyalty in England usually means a long tenure of the government because its supporters are obedient to the party whip. But the absence of definite parties in France means that the life of the government is always in danger through some sudden and new coalition of the many unstable groups. There may be three or four governments in as many months, the president trying always to "send for" that particular statesman whose chance of forming a stable cabinet seems to be the best.

The president of France is elected by an absolute majority of the National Assembly, which consists of joint sessions of the two houses, the Senate and the Chamber. His election is therefore indirect and no popular vote is immediately involved. He is elected for a term of seven years and he is eligible for a second term, but as a matter of fact no president has ever received this honor, and we may regard a second term as among the inexpediences that have become almost impossibilities. It does not seem that a second term has ever been suggested in the case of any president of France since 1875.

The powers of the president are easily enumerated, although it is to be remembered that there is usually a certain rounding of the edges that comes from practice and that no president will do all of the things that he is constitutionally empowered to do. It may be said then that the president of the French Republic may initiate laws concurrently with the two chambers, but if he ever does actually initiate laws he does so very invisibly and in such a way as to hold himself strictly aloof from party conflicts. He does not descend into the arena and he is in no sense the leader or the spokesman of a party. In this respect his functions much resemble those of the British monarch and he is not in any practical way the ruler of France. The president is supposed to promulgate the laws that have been passed by parliament. He has the usual rights of pardon. The armed forces of the republic are under his control, but he can not declare war without the consent of parliament. He may make all civil and military appointments, but, as has already been said, his power of appointment is practically limited to the officials of his own household. He presides over cabinet meetings. He has a limited power to negotiate and ratify treaties. He may dissolve the Chamber before the expiration of its term, but only upon the advice of the Senate, and he may adjourn parliament for the space of one month. He seems to have no power of absolute veto over legislation, but he may return a bill for further consideration. The foregoing may be said to comprise all the powers, actual and nominal, possessed by the president of the French Republic. France is governed, not by her president, but by her cabinet and her parliament. The composition of the French parliament is therefore much more important than the choice of the president, to which a comparatively small significance is to be attached. The most powerful man in France is the prime minister, and even his power depends wholly upon the support of parliament. An adverse vote and he disappears.

There is no room here for a consideration of the functions of the two houses, although a word may be said with regard to the Senate, inasmuch as the French Senate has certain characteristics not to be found in any other upper house. When the constitution was first enacted in 1875 the propriety of a second house was seriously challenged. It was said, and with some truth, that no matter what safeguards were adopted a second or upper house invariably took on certain characteristics in opposition to the tendencies of the lower house and even of democracy itself. Liberalism always tended toward conservatism when vested with special authorities and the only open road towards political evolution was through the mechanism of a single house directly and quickly responsible to the public will. Nevertheless wiser counsels prevailed and it was decided that there should be a Senate of 300 members, seventy-five of them to be nominated and removable, and the remainder to be elected by the departments in accordance with their population. But this scheme was found to be undesirable after some nine years of experiment. The nominated senators were abolished in 1884 and the whole of the Senate is now chosen by an electoral college. But the qualifications of the French senator are curiously different from those exacted in the case of the upper houses of other countries. It is always unsafe to speak of the political ideals of other peoples. We may judge them only by their results, and we may easily err. But it would seem that the French senator is chosen, not for his political ideas, but for his eminence in some one of the many domains of intellect and culture. The gift of a senatorship may sometimes be the reward of political capacity. It often is. But we may doubt if it is primarily conferred with that intention. It is more usually a distinction awarded to conspicuous mental or cultural ability, and indeed the French Senate may be compared with the French Academy as representative of everything that is best and most beautiful in French life. Whether any man ought to be endowed with governmental power because he happens to be a great writer or a great artist or a great philosopher is a point that need not here be argued. The British House of Lords has constantly been recruited from the ranks of the intellectually eminent as well as from those other ranks whose attainments are far more dubious. Moreover, the hereditary principle has always been observed in Great Britain. And yet the House of Lords as it is at present constituted is by no means without its useful functions or its quite real values. The art of government, we may suppose, does not depend nearly so much on the intelligent perfection of its mechanism as we are apt to believe. It depends far more on the political and social genius of its people. Almost any system, even the most autocratic, will work well with a people who are politically trained and self-disciplined. But without these virtues no system will work well, however theoretically perfect it may be. The unit of the state is the citizen. All states are self-governing and they always have been. Their qualities are the qualities of the individual citizen, and these can not be suppressed nor hidden. Bismarck said once that every nation had as much liberty as it deserved. All governments are representative governments in the deepest sense of that word, even though they represent only a slavish instinct or a servile obedience. Democratic institutions are impossible to all but democratic peoples, and with democratic peoples it does not matter much what sort of institutions they have. The French Senate or the British House of Lords are just as democratic as the New England town meeting since "the people will them."

It would certainly be significant of much if there should actually be a movement to enlarge the powers of the French president, to give him something of the autocracy exercised by a President of the United States. Perhaps we have been premature in assuming that the war would make for democracy. It is just as likely to make for autocracy. Democracy still stands upon a very uncertain foundation. It is still being tried in the balances. There is something in human nature that loves to be ruled, to be directed, to be "bossed." Certainly the war had no democratic results upon America. Almost overnight we found ourselves living under an autocracy as extreme, as ruthless as ever existed in Germany. Human rights disappeared as with the waving of a wand. Anything more audible than a thought was penalized. The Constitution was defied and is being defied at this moment. We passed under the rule of a potentate, a sort of absolute monarch. And in our perplexity we consented. We are now prepared to put the helm hard over once more and to lay the ship again upon her old course. None the less we came very near the rapids, so near as to give new meaning to the old adage about eternal vigilance. It is an unpleasant idea that a movement toward autocracy in France should be inspired by the misunderstood spectacle of autocracy in America.

There are 3000 counties in the United States, but only 27 per cent. of them possess within their borders a library of 5000 volumes.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Parley P. Christensen, candidate for President of the Farmer-Labor party, is 6 feet 4 inches tall. He has been grand master in the Grand Lodge of Elks.

Albert Spalding, American violinist, is now spending his vacation in Sydmouth, Devonshire, England. Mr. Spalding will make his third tour of Havana during the coming season, where he has already been engaged for five concerts at the Teatro Nacional.

After fighting for years for woman suffrage, Miss Alice Paul, prominent leader of the suffragists, finds herself without a vote in spite of the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment. Miss Paul is a citizen of the District of Columbia, and neither men nor women have the suffrage right there.

Mrs. Mary Roberts Rinehart, noted author, also a club woman, who has spent much of her time of late in Hollywood filming her novels, has just accepted the chairmanship of the representative women who are even now forming an executive advisory board to be identified with the interests of the Republican party.

Alexandre Millerand, who is now in his sixtieth year, owes much of his rise to a keen appreciation of the importance of technical efficiency of administration, especially in industry, shown by him during the war. He has been president of the council of administration of the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers (the national arts and trades school) and president of the International Society for the Protection of the Rights of Workers. In the Waldeck-Rousseau ministry he served between 1900 and 1902 as minister of commerce and public works.

The "divine Sarah" proves her vitality and her versatility in her seventy-fifth year by adding the art of novel-writing to her many accomplishments. Her first long novel makes its appearance in serial form in the illustrated daily paper Excelsior. In "La Petite Idole," as the work is called, there are reproduced many characters who were living during the last half-century, people in the theatrical, diplomatic, and social world. Mme. Sarah Bernhardt is now actress and stage manager, painter—her pictures have been praised at the Salon—sculptor and writer of memoirs, short stories, and a modern novel.

Hidden behind the loving personality of her distinguished father, Bessie Bacon, as Mrs. Harper, has been supporting Frank Bacon in "Lightnin'" at the Gaiety Theatre throughout the run of 834 consecutive performances and she has never missed one. The lives of the two are more intertwined than is usual among parents and children, as Bessie has been the right-hand business man of the firm. When Frank Bacon took out his quarter-section homestead at Mountain View, California, his time and that of his wife was taken up with earning sustenance and satisfying art with the Alhambra Stock Company in San Francisco. This did not give him much time for practical work, so the development of the 160 acres was taken over by Bessie. Today the family possesses one of the finest pieces of fruit land in the state. On it are extensive cherry and plum groves, and the income is said to be enough to support the entire clan of Bacon for all time.

Seattle's tallest skyscraper, the forty-two-story L. C. Smith Building, has a few recognized rivals among New York's high office buildings—none in any other city—but it has in Julius Langseth, the elevator starter, a human directory who challenges comparison. He's called the "human ouija board," but that hardly does him justice, for any statement he makes is indubitable. Like "Dad" he knows, and no chronic skeptic has any warrant for questioning anything he says about the 2500 occupants of the great building. He knows them all and all about them as thoroughly as any live-wire office boy knows what's going on in his particular domain. Langseth is one of the seven wonders of the world, according to Robert K. Dykes, manager of the towering building that is one of Seattle's civic boasts. He not only can tell offhand where to find any of the offices, but can direct the inquirer to any one who has moved out of the building in past years.

For nearly seven years Arizona has been watching with great interest the progress of Mrs. Nellie A. Hayward, representative from Cochise County, now candidate for the office of secretary of state. A woman who in little over two years has risen from the place of stenographer to the enrolling and engrossing committee to her present position of member of the house of representatives, and now holds the office of chairmanship of the same committee in the state, deserves much credit. She modestly disclaims all honor, contending that her progress was but a fulfillment of a moral obligation to her friends who elected her and a desire to succeed. Handicapped early in life by a limited education, Mrs. Hayward has by undaunted will and precision mastered stenography, Spanish, and a law course. Her personality and marked ability already girdle the state; but Mrs. Hayward's ambition will not be satisfied until the men and women in every state in the Union drop into the ballot-box the expression of their desires. Mrs. Hayward is chairman of the National Woman's party in her state.

THE REIGN OF PATTI.

Herman Klein Tells the Story of a Singer Who Was Before the Public for Fifty-Six Years.

Singers have their day and cease to be, and usually it is a brief day. But Adelina Patti was before the public for forty-five years and she was actually singing for thirty-four years. Indeed if we include her performances as a child prodigy we may say that she was singing for fifty-six years, a record unbroken in the history of music. Speaking to a famous critic in 1877, she said: "My father was a Sicilian; my mother a native of Rome; I saw the light of the world in Madrid, where they were both singing during the Italian season, and I was brought up in New York."

Mr. Herman Klein, who gives us 470 pages of Patti's biography, wisely confines the story of her childhood to a few pages. The first great event of Patti's life was her appearance on the opera stage in 1859, although there were some present upon that occasion who had already seen her on the concert platform. We are told that she was received with sympathetic encouragement, but without any artificial display of warmth or the persistent attentions of a friendly claque. One eye-witness, signing himself "S. H.," thus described the event in the Musical Courier:

The house was crowded to excess. Miss Patti's friends and admirers, who very numerous at that time already, were of course all present and full of hope; but as great as their expectations were, they were far surpassed. She took the house by storm; she not only sang as only she can sing, but looked lovely and acted well. Though a little timid at first, she displayed her great dramatic powers in the Mad Scene. She was simply dressed in gray silk trimmed with plaid, looked beautiful and modest; Walter Scott himself could not have imagined a more lovely or fascinating heroine whom he described as the unhappy Bride of Lammermoor. The day after the performance I called to see her; her parlor looked like a flower garden, she had received so many floral tributes she was at a loss where to place them.

In 1861 Mlle. Patti entered into a contract with Maurice Strakosch, acting for E. T. Smith, whereby she undertook "to sing four nights on approval, when, in case of success, she was to have a salary of £40 a week." But the contract was never carried out. Frederick Gye, who was the opponent of Smith at Covent Garden, arranged to pay the sum of £4000 for the cancellation of the contract, and he himself made a new contract with the young singer:

The new contract with Mr. Gye was, however, a rather one-sided document. By its terms he ran no risk whatever and stood to make a great deal of money. He was to allow Mlle. Patti three trial performances, for which no payment was to be made. In the event of failure at any of these, he was at liberty to decline to ratify the engagement. If the new-comer met with success, it was agreed that she should be engaged for five years, at the rate of £150 a month for the first year, £200 for the second, £250 for the third, £300 for the fourth, and £400 for the fifth. And it was further stipulated that she should sing twice a week. At this rate her average fee for the five years worked out at the huge sum of £32 10s. for each performance!

Two years later Patti was in Vienna after a Paris triumph. She made her initial courtesy at the Karl Theatre on February 28, 1863, a few days after her twentieth birthday. She was now receiving £80 a performance, and we are told that the audience fairly lost their heads and the excitement gradually pervaded the entire community. A foreign lady residing in Vienna told the story in a letter of which the following is an extract:

Mlle. Patti sang on Sunday, at 11 o'clock, at the Augustinerkirche, in the chorus of the Mass. Such crowds had forced their way into the church, at an early hour, that several persons fainted, and had to be carried out. During the service, too, a countless multitude assembled before the Augustinergasse, to await the moment when the celebrated singer should come out, and proceed to her carriage, which was waiting near at hand.

Scarcely had she made her appearance at the door, when the expectant crowd gathered round her with enthusiastic cheers, and so overwhelmed her with marks of their admiration, that the terrified girl, half fainting, and with imploring mien, strove to escape. While she was making the attempt, the friends who accompanied her were forced from her side, and thus nothing remained for her to do but to flee into the nearest house, the hôtel of Prince Palffy.

Fortunately, the maid of the Countess Ferrariz Zichi, who resides in the hôtel, had beheld the whole scene from the windows. Hurrying to meet the affrighted artist on the steps, she opened the door of the corridor, and, quickly closing it again, led Mlle. Patti into the apartments of the countess.

But the enthusiastic crowd had followed close upon the heels of the fair artist, and, running wildly up and down the steps, very nearly forced open the door. The mistress of the mansion, the Princess Palffy, was at last obliged to make her appearance, and her impressive words of warning finally succeeded in prevailing upon the ungallant multitude to retire in an orderly manner.

Meanwhile Mlle. Patti was conducted into the drawing-room, where, thanks to the hospitable attention of the countess's family, she recovered so far, after a short time, from the unexpected and hoisterous homage paid her, that her friends and attendants, who had hastened to rejoin her, were able to convey her without further risk to her carriage, and drive home.

The real beginning of Patti's home life in England must be dated from her return to London for the season of 1863. She took up her residence in Clapham and during this period her voice grew steadily in power. A friend said that "she had not changed a bit, but looked and acted as much like a girl in her teens as ever":

No artist of the theatre (with the exception, maybe, of Sarah Bernhardt) was ever asked so frequently if she could describe her elixir or write down her recipe for preserving a youthful aspect long after the age when most women begin to look old. Of course, she always denied that there was any such thing, and therein told the honest truth. But in searching for the real cause she often omitted to lay sufficient stress on the beneficial effect of her "simple life" at Clapham. She would try to account for it (just to satisfy her questioners) in all sorts of ways. Once she told a Parisian interviewer that the principal reason, in her opinion, lay in "her comparatively strict mode of living after she had passed the age of forty!"

"Up to forty," she said, "I stinted myself in nothing. I ate and lived as I chose. After forty, however, I became more strict. Since then I eat no red meat and drink only white wine and soda. When I feel weak, a glass of champagne picks me up. I never touch spirits or liqueurs. My diet consists of light food and white meat and vegetables. I always sleep with the window wide open in summer and partly open in winter, so as not to get the cold air straight on my face. I never get to bed early, hardly ever before half-past 12 or 1. A severe hygiene and an elaborate toilet before bed are absolutely necessary to any woman who does not want to get fat. That is my only secret of health."

Adelina's first sweetheart was a young Milanese of picturesque aspect and engaging manners. But he was in every way unsuitable and began at once to show the most intolerable jealousy even of stage lovers such as Mario, who played Romeo to Patti's Juliet. The engagement came to nothing and is only of interest as showing that Patti was by no means the calm and frigid person that has been depicted:

"She has never really been in love," was often said of Patti when it was thought that there were not enough tragic intensity in her acting. That may have been true—in some measure—down to the time when she discovered the real nature of her feelings for Ernest Nicolini, her second husband. Yet, even without Fräulein Lauw's trivial gossip, there is reason to believe that, during the five or six years that preceded her marriage with the Marquis de Caux, she more than once fell in and out of love.

Naturally, her opportunities for indulging in flirtations were not to be compared with those of most girls of her age; but she was far too sensible, too cognizant of the serious claims of her art, in a word, as the French say, too sage, to give real encouragement to any of the admirers who pestered her with their attentions.

But there was to be another lover, and a more fortunate one. In 1868 it began to be rumored that Patti had promised her hand to a certain French marquis. This distinguished gentleman was the Marquis de Caux, head of a noble but by no means wealthy family, then holding the position of equerry to Napoleon III at the Court of the Tuileries:

Now, the Emperor and the Empress Eugénie were both sincerely attached to Mlle. Patti. During her visits to Paris she was frequently invited to court and sometimes received quite en famille. Their majesties rarely missed one of her performances at the Théâtre-Italien; they led the applause, threw bouquets at her, and made her handsome presents. On these occasions they were always accompanied by the Marquis de Caux, who with equal regularity went to the back of the stage to convey the imperial congratulations. With him were generally two other scions of the French aristocracy, namely, the Vicomte d'Arry and the Baron de Saint-Amand; and all three gentlemen were madly in love with the bewitching artist. But the one with the most glib and fluent tongue, who could turn the neatest compliments without a suspicion of flattery, was the marquis. In course of time he made an impression. Seeing which he went to the empress, and without much trouble persuaded her to back him in a serious demand for the young lady's hand.

Patti's New York season of 1883 was followed by a tour through the country under the direction of Mapleson. It was a troublous journey, as funds were low and intrigues and quarrels frequent. But there were compensations in a succession of triumphs:

On their way to California the company paid a visit to Salt Lake City. There the "little lady" made great friends with the Mormon prophet, Brigham Young, and, accompanied by some of his apostles, he partook of a déjeuner in her private car, which stood, as usual, in a siding at the railway station. He requited her hospitality by allowing her to sing at an afternoon concert in the vast Mormon Tabernacle, which until then had never been utilized for any but religious services. The prices were fixed at a low figure (two dollars and a dollar), and the huge place was packed. Brigham Young was so delighted that he subsequently attended a performance of "Lucia" in which Patti sang at the Salt Lake Theatre on the same evening.

Tour followed upon tour, and always with the same results in increased fame and power. Patti was associated with Jean de Reszke, Gounod describing him as his ideal Romeo and Patti as his ideal Juliet. The author says:

Somehow a slight estrangement occurred between Mme. Patti and Jean de Reszke after their association in this notable revival. What gave rise to it I am unable to say, nor does that now matter; but, oddly enough, it was my good fortune to bring about a rapprochement between them. They had not met or spoken since "Romeo," when one evening they found themselves in each other's company at dinner at my flat in Whitehall Court. That was nearly eight years later.

Mme. Patti then greeted her old friends Jean and Edouard as if the links in their long spell of friendship had never been even strained, much less broken. At table she sat between Jean and myself; while Nicolini talked about his "Strads" to the great cellist, Piatti. A few years later, M. de Reszke, following Mme. Patti's example, added a small theatre to the resources of his elegant house in the Rue de la Faisanderie; and more than once, when visiting Paris, she delighted him and his guests by appearing upon the little stage in some scene from her well-remembered repertory.

The marvelous preservation of Patti's voice was now becoming one of the musical wonders of the day. She told the "secret" to Mr. William Armstrong after she had been singing more than fifty years, and he reproduced her words in an article entitled "Mme. Patti's Advice to Singers: Her Own Rules for Preserving the Voice":

People who cultivate the voice have widely different ideas on what constitutes the best methods of its preservation. If I gave lessons, I should cultivate the middle tones, and the voice of the singer would be good at the age of a hundred. The whole harm to a voice comes in pushing it up and down, in trying to add notes to its compass.

"How high can you sing?" appears to be the question. But what about the foundation part of the voice—that is, the middle notes? My success is founded on those notes, and there can be no enduring success without them. How many can sing very high and yet can not sing 'Home, Sweet Home'! Some pooh-pooh the idea of the difficulty of that simple melody. But it is more difficult to sing 'Home, Sweet Home' than the waltz song from 'Romeo and Juliet,' because of its demands upon the development of the voice. Without the beautiful middle notes there is no cantabile, and upon the proper development of these, and the avoidance of strain by forcing high and low notes, the enduring powers of the singer depend.

High gymnastics are very beautiful; but, lose the middle notes, and you lose all. The very high and the very low notes are the ornaments, but what good are Gohelins and pictures if you have no house to hang them in?

The tremolo, one of the most objectionable and unbearable of vocal faults, is but a phase of this forcing, and comes of the spreading of the vocal chords through straining.

How often the question has been put to me: "Mme. Patti, how high can you sing?" and I have thought: "Are you at it, too?" The middle voice is the one that you need to sing with. I sing comfortably.

If you want to sing for years, do not strain the natural compass of the voice. That is like living on capital. I have always lived within my income, and I have always had something to put aside.

The question of success or failure as a singer is simplified by self-judgment and discrimination. Many voices are not worth the cultivation, and that means time and opportunities lost. Very often students wear out their voices with over-study before they appear in public. They destroy the freshness of the voice by singing too much.

As to the length of time to be devoted to study, I myself do not give more than fifteen or twenty minutes to it daily, and these few minutes I devote to scales. . . .

My golden rule in singing is to spare myself until the voice is needed, and then never to give it all out. Put it in the bank. I do not push my voice for the pleasure of the moment. If you are prodigal of your powers at such times, the next time you wish to be generous you can not.

Presence of mind is an eminently desirable possession to the opera singer. Contretemps will sometimes happen, and only quickness of wit can save the situation. Of this the author gives us various illustrations. Says Patti herself:

Once I was singing in "Lucia" with a tenor as Edgardo whom I had never seen. As Edgardo and his brother are dressed alike in the first scene, when I appeared on the stage I did not know which one I was to sing to. Already my music was sounding from the orchestra. "Which is Edgardo?" I asked hastily.

"The one to the left," was the answer. And I hurried toward him, singing as I went.

In an episode of a different description the opera was "Traviata," and the tenor a forgetful one. In the duet in the last act he suddenly began to sing my part. In a flash I had to take up his until, as suddenly, his memory returned. When the curtain was rung down he thanked me with tears in his eyes. It was the second incident of the kind that had happened to him, and the first had not been so fortunate for both singers.

Adelina Patti's bijou theatre at Craig-y-Nos Castle has been so often described that no further notice of it need be given here. The author tells us of the inaugural performance on August 12, 1891, given before a distinguished company and at which the singer seems to have surpassed herself:

But the miracle that overshadowed all else was the sweet, virginal Marguerite of the singer of forty-eight summers, who could cheat us into the belief that she was still the girl depicted by Goethe. I wrote at the time: "It was the triumph of the night which might have been easiest foretold. Her white Gretchen costume became her to perfection, and she made a delicious picture as she sat spinning at her wheel and warbling the 'King of Thule' with the greatest imaginable poetic feeling." More than once one had the impression that the whole thing was a dream. Could this truly be Patti—the inimitable and adorable songstress worshipped in two hemispheres—still looking and singing like a maid in her teens and striving her hardest to please on her own twenty-five-by-twenty-five-foot stage down in this remote corner of Wales? It seemed curious and uncanny enough to be unreal; and it gave one "furiously to think."

Signor Nicolini, Patti's husband, was fond of fishing and shooting, and particularly of shooting. His pheasants were jealously preserved, and this sometimes led to trouble. On one occasion Nicolini was so indiscreet as to fire in the direction of the castle:

Nicolini became very excited. Not heeding or understanding his game-keeper's warning, he first fired at the pheasants as they flew toward the castle, then crossed the bridge and began to follow them up. Both proceedings proved disastrous. His tiny leaden shot fell on the glass roof of the conservatory just when Mme. Patti happened to be sitting beneath it, and the noise of the firing coming nearer roused in her not only alarm, but anger. The climax arrived when Nicolini got into the kitchen-garden and began aiming at the poor birds there. I think he hit one. What would have happened next I know not, had he not heard his distraught spouse calling to him from the distance. Only then did he hand his gun to the nearest keeper. (I had discreetly given up mine some time before.) Over the domestic sequel to this curious episode I draw a veil.

Adelina Patti lived long enough to see the whole of the great war, and she was profoundly affected by its tragedies, which involved alike the country of her parentage and of her adoption:

The sufferings and horrors of the great war cast a deep shadow over the closing years of this sensitive woman's existence. She missed her journeys on the Continent, her trips to Switzerland and Bayreuth, the changes of scene to which she had grown accustomed since 1900. During the winter that followed the signing of the armistice her health began seriously to fail. Early in 1919 a medical consultation was held, and the doctors detected unmistakable signs of growing heart-weakness. She was taken to the seaside and spent her last—her seventy-sixth—birthday at Brighton.

The author may be congratulated on a biography that is alike timely and competent. Many good illustrations add largely to its value.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending September 25, 1920, were $135,000,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $153,400,000; a gain of $1,600,000.

Debits to individual account of banks belonging to 154 of the country's more important Clearing House Associations for the week ending September 15th totaled 8985 millions, compared with 7167 millions in the previous week of five business days, according to the weekly report of the Federal Reserve Board.

Aggregate debits for the corresponding week of 1919 were 14 per cent. larger than for the week reviewed.

The total for the Twelfth District was $389,324,000, compared with $488,345,000 the previous week and $379,372,000 in the corresponding week a year ago. The figures for the three weeks respectively were ($000 omitted) for San Francisco, $257,254, $209,652, and $240,128; Oakland, $20,979, $21,617, and $14,483; Berkeley, $3,296, $3,247, $2,752; Sacramento, $19,922, $14,142, $16,019; San Jose, $7,049, $5,316, $6,043; Fresno, $15,783, $10,326, $11,318; Stockton, $6,551, $4,359, $5,486; Los Angeles, $101,524, $84,515, $90,259; San Diego, $8,876, $8,561, $6,141; Salt Lake City, $19,288, $15,172, $16,550; Portland, $48,300, $37,355, $59,608; Seattle, $49,953, $34,511, $60,637; Spokane, $14,080, $12,030, $15,561; Tacoma, $12,414, $9,178, $14,714.

Very many people are now interested in the value of foreign moneys and foreign exchange who before the great war never would have present time lower than they ever were, an appearance rather perplexing to most of those following the rise and fall of these rates. The explanations given for this unprecedented occurrence is as divergent as the number of foreign exchange "experts" is growing.

English pound sterling has dropped to the lowest level this last week, when it reached $3.45 instead of its normal value of $4.87. French francs and Italian liras went down to their lowest quotations, too. The European bankers, and especially the English bankers, up to a few years ago considered the almighty dictators of international finance, very much dislike the idea of being taxed now by the American Wall Street bosses and being dictated the rate of English pound sterling from New York. England is striving frantically to regain its lost dictatorial position in the world's money market, but how this can be done, with the many millions of loaned dollars from America becoming due successively during the next few years, is very hard to guess. It looks as if the money centre of the world has definitely shifted from London to New York. New York is now handling the medicine to London which London for so many decades handed to the world, in rating a country's currency according to the gold reserve primarily and secondarily only considering the trade balances and the general prosperity of its population.

It is the ratio of the gold reserve to the paper money in circulation which is the chief cause of the depreciation of the European currencies in this country, although the Wall Street exchange rates do not at all represent the actual purchasing power of the European moneys in the respective countries. A striking instance is the German money rate, which went down with the English and French rates during the last few weeks because the English and French rates, still the dominant rates for Europe, went down in value on account of the five-hundred-million-dollar loan falling due on the 1st of October, known as the Anglo-French five-hundred-million-dollar loan. England and France's pride as solvable states forbids them to ask for an extension of the very first loan becoming due to America and they were determined to scrape together every available gold dollar or dollar security to pay off this loan. France is able to pay back only 150 millions of the 250 millions and has therefore issued the last hundred-million-dollar loan, at present offered for subscription in this country at the unheard-of interest rate of 8 per cent. to cover the other remaining 100 million dollars. England is determined to pay back in full her share of the loan with 250 million dollars in gold. This naturally depletes the gold reserve of these two countries, England and France, and correspondingly increases America's gold holdings, thereby reducing the value of pounds sterling and francs and increasing the international value of American currency, although the private individual in these countries affected will not notice very much of a difference in the purchasing power of his country's money in his respective country, except in dealings abroad. The price of German marks went down to 1 1/2 cent per mark last week, whereas the normal rate for marks is 23.8 cents. But people in Germany may obtain board and lodgings in a fairly comfortable boarding-house in any of the big cities at the rate of 500 marks per month. Five hundred marks exchanged into dollars according to international exchange rates would be worth only about $7.50. It is evident that nowhere in the United States could anybody get room and board for $7.50 a month, although America is the greatest food-producing country, prices having doubled for food since 1914 here, whereas food prices in Germany are about ten times what they were in 1914, figured in marks. A big stein of beer can still be bought for about 75 pfennig in Germany, which reduced to American cents would represent only 1 cent. Every anti-prohibitionist may well dream of the possibilities of 10 American cents invested in thick foam 7 per cent. Munich beer and resign with a sigh to less than one-half of 1 per cent. W. J. B. grape juice. A sack of potatoes along the Rhine is sold for 10 marks, or 15 cents American money. Imagine 133 pounds of potatoes being obtainable for 15 cents here. These examples shall only prove the discrepancy between the value of European moneys in this country, as fixed by the Wall Street bankers and the real value of these moneys in their respective countries.

Very many millions of dollars have of late been invested in European securities on account of the low exchange rates prevailing at present, because all indications tend toward a rise in the exchange rates as soon as conditions in Europe get more settled towards which end another financial conference of the representatives of the European powers soon is to meet in Switzerland to discuss and arrange the vexed foreign exchange question satisfactorily to all.—Karl Offer, Exchange Agent.

There has always existed, on the Pacific Coast, and more particularly in San Francisco, the erroneous idea that manufacturing enterprises could not profitably compete with the East and Middle West.

It has now and has been for some years conclusively demonstrated by actual performance that the labor cost for a given operation averages less on the Pacific Coast than in any other section of the country. Consequently there is room here for unlimited industrial development.

Industrial securities have a particular appeal to the average investor. By confining your investments to Pacific Coast industrials you are adding to your personal wealth directly by the dividend return and appreciation in value of those securities; and indirectly by the benefits that must inevitably accrue to you through the development and expansion of the industrial area of your home section. In addition you have the advantage of observation at close range.—McCann & Co., Inc.

In its September financial letter the Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Los Angeles has the following to say about the country's financial situation:

"The prices at which all commodities, including labor, are selling, causes a demand for credit largely in excess of normal, considering the volume of business done. The strain, which always comes at this season of the year, is being successfully met. The inability of the railroads to handle freight expeditiously or to furnish cars in sufficient quantities to care for the needs of the shipping public, whereby both raw materials and manufactured goods are held at initial points when they should be at points of consumption, is increasing the credit strain. The farmer can not get his grain to market, hence can not get money for it. In the meantime he must borrow for his immediate necessities. The manufacturer can not deliver his goods to purchasers, hence can not get returns for them. This cramps him financially, as he must pay for labor, material, and up-keep. And so it goes all along the line. While the expenses of the roads have been largely increased, their revenues will be augmented by increased rates granted them. More important still, credit which has been denied them in the past is now forthcoming.

"The public has at last been disillusioned as to the railroads. In the future the utterances of the demagogues, trying to destroy them, will fall upon deaf ears. Transportation is the life-blood of this nation. The roads within another year will be in a position to render the country the services which its increased business will demand. In the meantime the public must have patience and co-operate with the roads in every way possible.

"Interest rates necessarily continue high. They will remain so just as long as the demand for credit remains as strenuous as it now is. At some time in the future all prices, including interest rates, will go as much below normal as they now are above normal. That time, however, is some time off."

Last offering of $200,000 of common stock of the Fageol Motors Company of Oakland will be made this week by the C. W. Gordon Company in blocks of one share preferred stock and one share of common with a unit par value of $20 for $12.50. The preferred stock is a 5 per cent. security cumulative non-assessable.

The Fageol Company has no bonded indebtedness or mortgages, and paid the agreed dividends on its preferred stock last year. This preferred stock is a first lien on its assets. No bonds can be issued except with the consent of two-thirds of the owners of preferred stock.

Fageol Company's gross sales of trucks and tractors last year amounted to $1,000,000 with earnings equivalent to 30 per cent. at the present market price of its common stock. The purpose of the new issue is to provide capital for the purchase of raw material with which to double actual production immediately.

The California Fageol plant covers thirteen and a half acres of ground in East Oakland, and employs 155 men. The new schedule of production calls for an output of fifty-two trucks and tractors a month. At the present time Frank R. Fageol, secretary and general manager of the company, is in the East, where he has organized the Fageol Motors Company of Ohio, which is expected to start production by the middle of next month. The Eastern company will compensate the parent company of California for manufacturing rights and use of Fageol truck transmission patents and exclusive tractor features.

L. H. Bill, president of the Fageol Company, states that the company's profits for the first six months of 1920 amounted to three times its obligations to preferred stockholders, and that it is expected the company will do a business of over $2,000,000 in 1920. At the present time the company has on its books orders for more than $50,000 worth of motors and tractors for Pacific Coast delivery, in addition to orders on hand for more than $250,000 worth of machines from England and Java.

bonds of this issue are priced at 94, to yield 7.88 per cent., and the stock at 96 with an accrued dividend to yield over 8.33. This issue is placed on the market by a syndicate headed by E. H. Rollins & Sons.

B. B. & R. Knight, Inc., has been incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts, September, 1920, as successor to B. B. & R. Knight, Incorporated, a Rhode Island corporation, one of the largest manufacturers of cotton cloth in the world, a business which has been successfully conducted since 1848.

The company's famous trade-mark, "Fruit of the Loom," has been known throughout the country for several generations as the hall mark of quality in cotton goods.

The seventeen mills of the company, located throughout Rhode Island and in Massachusetts, including the new Royal Mill (as of its completion), have an aggregate floor space of about 3,000,000 square feet and employ about 5500. The equipment of these mills includes about 533,457 spindles and 13,310 looms. The Pontiac bleachery has a capacity thought of investing a cent abroad. Even in the financial centres of America, New York and Chicago, only a very few foreign bonds were quoted at the stock exchanges. Some Argentine, Mexican, Chinese, and Canadian municipal or railroad bonds were about the only ones traded in regularly. Whoever wanted to invest for sentimental reasons in European municipalities or government securities asked his bank to buy such and such security abroad for his account. This situation has changed greatly since the armistice and millions and millions of dollars are now invested in foreign, principally European, securities, chiefly on account of the very low exchange rates.

These foreign exchange rates are at the of about 50,000,000 yards per annum. The company has installed power capacity of 26,000 horsepower, of which about 30 per cent. is water power. The properties of the company include dwelling houses, stores, farms, in fact, entire communities inhabited largely by their employees.

These bonds will be secured in the opinion of counsel by direct first mortgage on all real estate, plants, machinery, and equipment to be presently acquired by the company, with the exception of one mill previously sold, and all trade-marks, patents, and good-will. The remaining first mortgage bonds may only be issued under conservative restrictions in the deed of trust.

The deed of trust provides a sinking fund, beginning December 1, 1923, payable semi-annually in cash or bonds at the redemption rates, equal to 3 per cent. per annum of the maximum amount of bonds at any time issued plus an amount equal to the interest which would have been payable on all bonds previously retired by the sinking fund. The ope-show a value in excess of $15,000,000, or $2000 for each $1000 bond.

According to the annexed balance sheet prepared by Messrs. Price, Waterhouse & Co., after giving effect to present financing, the net quick assets after appropriating $2,000,000 for new construction and $1,000,000 for a reserve for inventory depreciation, are $7,749,513, or over $1000 for each $1000 bond, and the net tangible assets, exclusive of good-will, brands, and trade-marks, are $30,049,746, or over $4000 for each $1000 bond.

The Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company in offering the 6 per cent. tax-exempt bonds of the James Irrigation District (Fresno County) on a 6.20 per cent. basis draw an interesting parallel between present-day conditions and those of a decade ago. Then land was held in large holdings of thousands of acres. These immense tracts were dry farmed or used as cattle and sheep range. With the increase in population and the consequent demand for food the appreciation in values and the development of water for irrigation it became more and more difficult to operate large areas profitably. To encourage the development of land by irrigation the California Irrigation District Act was enacted. Since 1897 millions of irrigation district bonds have been issued and sold under this act without a single default in payment of principle or interest, while the wealth of the state has been immeasurably increased by the large numbers of land-owners and the appreciation of land values.

Coincident with the change in the ownership of land has come an increase in the number of investors. The Liberty Loan and the Federal income tax have helped this second transition. Yet in spite of the increased number of investors, bond prices are lower than for a generation. In 1914 tax-exempt securities yielded an average of 4 1/4 per cent., in 1919 4 1/2 per cent., while at the present time the average income return is about 5 1/2 per cent. Furthermore, the income tax operates to decrease the investment funds of wealthy individuals. By way of illustration, a large banking house received 700 subscriptions to a recent issue—the average subscription being for $4000. This was the experience of one of many houses. Looking toward the future, it seems that, with a broader demand due to the increased number of investors and an easier money market, higher bond prices should prevail.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company has just purchased $100,000 6 per cent. serial improvement bonds of Portland, Oregon, at the highest price the city has received on its bonds in several months. Several bids were received and indicates a decided strengthening of the bond market. The bonds are offered at 101 and interest, yielding nearly 5 1/2 per cent to nearly 6 per cent.

A San Francisco Bay institution that is bringing additional fame to California is the C. L. Best Tractor Company, whose plant is at San Leandro.

One of the letters received by the management last week tells of the triumph of the Best tractor over all others in Italy, and particularly in the Roman provinces.

The following is a translated excerpt from the letter of Duilio Pignocchi:

"I have experimented with Best tractors for a long time in Italy, where they gave the very best results, not only in the north, but even in the central states, like the Roman territory and similar zones of flinty or clayish and very hard ground—so hard, indeed, that it was considered impossible to cultivate.

"The only machine during the war, and even during the time that our government had made large acquisitions in North American tractors of small and great capacity, the only tractor that in the Roman territory was working without interruption and without the slightest inconvenience, was the Best.

"In those lands it carried with perfect ease three coulters to a goodly depth, while under those local conditions and circumstances of time and season absolutely all of the other plowing machine tractors had to stop for about two months or more because they were unable to plow unless with but one plowshare, which of course was impossible because unsuitable. The large zone of Tore del Pedigione, Cirrocceto, was filled with government tractors. I was there and saw them myself and can certify to the fact that during the hot season, which is dry, they are always idle, while the Best, and this one only, was continually plowing that entire territory, and if the war had continued longer the government for that very reason, absolutely convinced, would have passed their orders to the C. L. Best Company without asking as to the cost."

Mr. G. H. Schellenbach, secretary of the Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company and sales manager of the Los Angeles office, was a visitor in the financial district. Mr. Schellenbach is en route to Honolulu with his bride.

The increasing reliance of the United States upon the tropics for food and manufacturing material is evidenced by the fact that over three billion dollars' worth of tropical and sub-tropical products entered Continental United States in the fiscal year 1920 against less than one billion dollars' worth in 1913 and less than half a billion in 1900. Of course, says a statement of the National City Bank of New York, discussing this closer relation of the United States with its neighbors in the tropics, some part of this tremendous increase in values is due to the "high cost of" but nevertheless it is a fact that the quantity of tropical products consumed in the United States has tremendously increased and seems likely to go on increasing, irrespective of high and still advancing prices. For example, the quantity of cane sugar, all tropical, of course, entering Continental United States in the fiscal year 1920 was nearly 9,500,000,000 pounds against a little more than 7,500,000,000 in the immediately preceding year and less than 6,000,000,000 a decade ago. Of coffee, strictly tropical, the quantity imported in the fiscal year 1920 was 1,400,000,000 pounds against 1,000,000,000 a year earlier and only 871,000,000 in 1910. Cocoa, also exclusively tropical, shows a total of 420,000,000 pounds in the imports of 1920 against 109,000,000 in 1910. Coconut oil, now so largely used for food purposes in various forms, was 269,000,000 pounds in 1920 against 48,000,000 in 1910, and all of these at much higher prices than heretofore.

In manufacturing material the increasing demands upon the tropics are quite as striking as in those of foodstuffs. Of india rubber, strictly tropical, the imports in 1920 were 632,000,000 pounds, in 1910 only 101,000,000 pounds; of raw cotton the imports into this greatest cotton-growing country of the world were in 1920 345,000,000 pounds against 86,000,000 in 1910; of raw silk, the product of at least a sub-tropical climate, the 1920 imports were 47,000,000 pounds against 20,000,000 in 1910; tobacco, 94,000,000 pounds in 1920 against 47,000,000 in 1910.

This increase in quantities imported has been made despite tremendous advances in prices meantime. The average price of raw sugar imported from foreign countries in the fiscal year 1920 was 9 cents per pound against an average of 2 1/2 cents per pound in 1910, yet the quantity imported in 1920 was, as already shown, more than 50 per cent. in excess of that of 1910. Cocoa imports in 1920 average 17 cents per pound against about 11 cents per pound in 1910, yet the quantity imported in 1920 was four times as great as in 1910. Raw silk imports in 1920 average $9.30 per pound against an average of $3.21 in 1910, yet the quantity imported in 1920 was double that of 1910. Raw cotton imported in 1920 averaged for the full year 42 cents per pound against about 18 cents per pound in 1910, yet the quantity imported in 1920 was four times as much, as in 1910, irrespective of the fact that the price per pound had advanced 150 per cent.

These figures of the increasing importation of tropical products irrespective of the advance in price explain in some degree at least the fact that we are now sending to the tropical and sub-tropical world three billion dollars a year to purchase its varied products as against a little over a half-billion dollars a decade ago.

Happily, continues the bank's statement, our tropical friends have apparently recognized the increase in our calls upon them for their natural products and are reciprocating this attitude by a large increase in their takings of our products. Manufactures of all sorts and certain foodstuffs, especially meat, condensed milk, and flour, are the principal importations into the tropics, and its people are steadily and rapidly increasing their use of these articles as produced in the United States. The value of our exports to the tropical world in the fiscal year 1920 aggregated, in round terms, nearly two billion dollars against less than half a billion in 1910.

ration of this sinking fund will retire over 25 per cent. of the present issue before its maturity.

The company covenants to maintain net quick assets at all times equal to not less than 50 per cent. of all bonds outstanding, including bonds retired by the sinking fund.

The average net profits from January 1, 1917, to August 14, 1920, after deducting adequate maintenance, but before depreciation and Federal taxes, have been $2,194,236 per annum, or over four times the annual interest requirements of the first mortgage bonds. In determining these profits all improvements and renewals have been deducted in lieu of depreciation. In 1921 the present capacity will be increased over 20 per cent. by the completion of the Royal Mill.

The Personal Equation.

A picture, says Mr. Woodbury, is a description of a personal reaction. The mind of the painter selects what he wants from a scene and ignores the remainder. But the mind of the critic may select something quite different—hence the criticism. Elsewhere Mr. Woodbury says that a picture is a visible expression of our personal artistic impulse, and again that a picture is a thought or feeling expressed in terms of Nature. Indeed it would be possible to fill a couple of columns with Mr. Woodbury's illuminating dicta to be found in a volume by no means large, and yet with enough solid artistic wisdom to satisfy the most exacting.

Mr. Woodbury writes mainly for the student, although he devotes a concluding chapter to the public. Without professing to teach the art of painting he yet lays down certain broad principles that can hardly fail to be practically useful. Thus he warns us of the changing moods of nature and the difference that a single hour will make in a seascape. Establish quickly, he says, the important masses, and having thus insured consistency, the details can receive subsequent attention. But there is no substitute for intelligence and there should be no rules so rigid as to be unyielding to necessity. Once more, one might fill columns with such condensations of artistic wisdom, but a review is necessarily limited, although not to such an extent as to exclude the following sagacity: "The desire to astonish, to hurt, to corrupt, or even the record of those feelings in ourselves, all are destructive. Every human impulse that is on the wrong side may creep into a picture and continue its harm in so doing."

PAINTING AND THE PERSONAL EQUATION. By Charles H. Woodbury. N. A. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $2.

A Historical Comparison.

We all know that history repeats itself, but we do not all realize how strictly true is the old adage. In this volume Gilbert Murray tells us of the great war of the ancient Greeks. By modern standards it was not a great war, but a small one. None the less it was a facsimile in miniature of the late convulsion. Sparta and Athens were the combatants, but the whole of Hellas ranged itself upon one side or the other. There were the pacifists, the defeatists, and the peace-by-arrangement parties. Women did the work of men, and one may even identify the statesmen of today in the leaders of the great Hellenic war. It meant the downfall of Greece and the rise of Rome, and so the student may uneasily wonder how far the parallel is to be carried and if we shall presently be called upon to witness the crumbling of the walls of European civilization and one more finished chapter in the history of a race that has already been the spectator of many such chapters.

OUR GREAT WAR AND THE GREAT WAR OF THE ANCIENT GREEKS. By Gilbert Murray. New York: Thomas Seltzer.

Collecting.

Here is a book that should delight the collector and also aid him if his ambitions are above the level of postage stamps and tobacco pipes. Mr. Teall looks upon intelligent collecting as a department of history, as of course it is. It brings us into contact with the atmosphere of the past, and in the most practical way. Every acquired object is a point of departure for research and study.

Mr. Teall deals with all sorts and conditions of things. Every chapter might be expanded into a book. He tells us of furniture, plates, pewter, portraits, embroideries, marqueterie, porcelain, enamels, gems, and a dozen other things. He warns us against fraud, furnishes us with tests of genuineness, and acts as guide, philosopher, and friend to those who would walk this most interesting if most difficult of paths. And his illustrations are of so practical a kind as to add largely to the value of his work.

THE PLEASURES OF COLLECTING. By Gardner Teall. New York: The Century Company.

Some Books for the Young.

One may infer that Christmas is approaching from the number of books for the young that are being ground from the literary mills. As for their quality, it may be said that they are equal to the average.

"At the Sign of the Two Heroes," by Adair Aldon (Century Company), is a story of boys, smugglers, and a small town community. The smugglers of old were so much more interesting than the smugglers of today, although not nearly so numerous.

In somewhat more classic mood is "A Treasury of Hero Tales," edited by Alice C. Bryant (Thomas Y. Crowell Company). Here we find the stories of Perseus, Siegfried, Sir Galahad, Beowulf, Cuchulain, Robin Hood, and others, well told and of the most wholesome kind.

Of more modern type is "Reddy Brant: His Adventures," by W. C. Tuttle (Century Company). It consists of a number of lively Wild West stories all centering around the figure of fourteen-year-old Reddy Brant.

Also to the Century Company must be credited a collection of "Travel Stories," retold from St. Nicholas. This ever popular magazine for the young has now so permanent a hold that its name upon a title-page is sufficient guarantee of excellence.

Among current stories for girls is "Rainbow Gold," by Millicent Evison, which comes from the Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company.

It has good characterization and vivid incident. Other stories from the same house are "Four Girls of Forty Years Ago," by Nine Rhoades, and "Dorothy Dainty at Gen Island," by Amy Brooks. The former is a good picture of the life of the last generation, while the Dorothy Dainty books are so well known as to carry their own recommendation.

Brief Reviews.

"Indian Vengeance," by L. F. Jones (the Stratford Company), is an embodiment of the author's experience with the Indians of Alaska, and while the story itself is fictitious it conveys an accurate picture of an interesting people.

The latest addition to the Marden Inspirational Books is "Success Fundamentals," by Orison Swett Marden (Thomas Y. Crowell Company). It deals with health, success, efficiency, confidence, salesmanship, and the law of opulence.

The "Boys' Book of Sea Fights," by Chelsea Curtis Fraser (Thomas Y. Crowell Company), is an admirable account with illustrations of the great naval battles of the world from Drake to Beatty. The battles are intelligently described and the maps and plans are practical and useful.

E. P. Dutton & Co. have published "Eastern Stories and Legends," by Marie L. Shedlock, with a foreword by Professor T. W. Rhys Davis. These are stories of the various Buddha rebirths arranged and selected for the reading of children. One learns with some surprise that many of Aesop's fables are taken from these legends. It is an admirable book for the young.

"A Boy in Serbia," by E. C. Davies (Thomas Y. Crowell Company) is the story of a boy's life in the little Balkan state of Serbia, written in clear, entertaining style for other boys. "Milosav" tells his own tale, beginning with his earliest recollections. He is the child of a better-class farmer in a land which does not differ widely in product from parts of our own country.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

William MacLeod Raine, whose "Big Town Round-Up" will soon appear under the Houghton Mifflin Company's imprint, and who is the author of many other popular Western novels, recently told this story on himself in a talk before the American Library Association at its annual meeting. He was leaving a theatre when a lady called over to his wife, "Oh, we've been so charmed with your husband's book. We fight to see who'll get at it." Mrs. Raine, usually wise in such matters, was unwise for once. She said, "Which one?" (Business of lady hoisting S. O. S. signal. Business of consulting with friend husband. Business of friend husband shrugging his shoulders, as though to say, "You got into this. I can't get you out.") The lady turned and called brightly above the intervening press, "The red one."

"The Twelve," published by B. W. Huebsch, Inc., the Marcellaise of the Russian revolution, depicting the marching of twelve soldiers through frozen Petrograd, will be ready in pamphlet form within a week. Two million copies of this poem sold in Russia.

Joseph Conrad, although he has been transplanted to England for many years and has become such a master of the English language that he is considered one of the greatest living stylists, is at heart and always will remain a Pole. He is now engaged in making Poland's cause understood abroad. Recently he has addressed an appeal to Americans which marks him as a patriot of the same pure intention as his fellow-countryman Paderewski.

At last another full length, characteristic novel from Edith Wharton! It is of New York society in its age of innocence, about 1880, when it drove up Fifth Avenue in victorias. The breath of a newer day comes to it in Ellen, Countess Olenska, who has fled under circumstances of a compromising nature from her brutal Polish husband. Through family connections she succeeds in reentering formal, meticulous, and disapproving New York society, hoping there to forget her past; but a discontent, horn of artistic, freedom-loving Continental life, disturbs her.

Irvin Cobb, as every one knows, got a half a vote for the presidential nomination at the San Francisco convention. And the man who "discovered" Irvin Cobb is in Sing Sing! He is Charles E. Chapin, for over twenty years city editor of the New York Evening World. Of course unearthing the famous humorist isn't solely responsible for the life sentence which he is now serving. The full record of the sad tragedy which terminated the editor's brilliant career is told in his book just published by Putnam's under the title of "Charles Chapin's Story."

Use of automobiles, at least "once or twice a week," is among the many inducements to servant girls and maids in St. Paul.

A new use for nickel was developed late in the war. In England, says an English authority, when people were suffering from the lack of butter, it was freely suggested that margarine was being made from whale oil. Perhaps it was; anyway, whale oil can be converted by the aid of nickel, into a substance which in taste, smell, and appearance is almost identical with mutton tallow. The change is brought about by what is known as the process of hydrogenation, which consists simply in exposing the oil at a high temperature under pressure to an atmosphere of hydrogen in the presence of very finely divided nickel. In these conditions the liquid oil, which is already a compound of carbon and hydrogen, takes up more hydrogen, and when cooled appears as a firm substance exactly like mutton tallow and quite suitable for the manufacture of margarine. The nickel does not enter in any way into the new product, it simply acts by its presence only—that is to say, as a catalytic; it determines the new combination.

The body of Napoleon III lies in a tomb in the Church of St. Michael at Farnborough, England. This chapel was built by the empress Eugénie as a memorial to her husband. In the crypt also is placed the tomb of her son, the Prince Imperial, who was killed while fighting with the English army in Zululand. The church is a magnificent building of white stone, and stands on the brow of a hill. It is surmounted by a tower and pinnacled with dozens of small shafts. The empress used to visit the chapel daily. Ten priests were constantly employed by her to say masses for the dead.

French Verse.

There are very few translations of poetry that can be read without a certain dissatisfaction. If the translator is a poet he gives us his own beauties. If he is not a poet he obscures the beauties of the original.

None the less we have here a series of translations that are quite exceptional. Albert Boni, who edits this fine book of translated French verse, says that his selections are of high poetical merit, fully capable of standing squarely on their own feet as adequate renderings of the original. Where this claim seems extravagant, the reader is asked to accept the selection as one of several that were included to give the volume the proper proportions that such an anthology must possess.

The volume contains considerably over two hundred selections, and among the translators we notice the names of Longfellow, O'Shaughnessy, Chaucer, Andrew Lang, W. E. Henley, D. G. Rossetti, Oscar Wilde, Austin Dobson, Ford Madox Hueffer, Keats, Ezra Pound, Edmund Gosse, Robert Bridges, George Santayana, Arthur Symonds, Lafcadio Hearn, George Meredith, and Ludwig Lewisohn. Such a list certainly leaves nothing to be desired as a guarantee of translating excellence and indeed a survey of the book shows it to consist in the main of poetic values.

The Adventurous Lady.

Even the most original writers are compelled sometimes to use the most unoriginal plots. The merit, after all, is in the treatment, and not in the idea.

And so we find Mr. Snaith telling us the old story of an exchange of identities. Lady Elfreda Carabbas, going by train to a country house party at which she is to be the star in some war-relief theatricals, finds that she has Miss Cass as her traveling companion. Now Miss Cass is a poor little governess who dreams dreams of the aristocratic life and looks longingly through the bars of the gilded cage and imagines what it must be to occupy it. Lady Elfreda, on the other hand, is inexpressibly bored by the frivolities, the insincerities, and the marriage-mongering that make up her lot in life and would give a large part of her autocratic little soul to taste independence and liberty.

The two girls get into conversation and exchange ideals. Each covets the career of the other. Then Lady Elfreda seizes the nettle with both hands. Why should they not exchange identities for a brief season of experiment. No one knows her among the company to which she is going. Why should not Miss Cass personate her while she personates Miss Cass and undertakes the government of two unruly children. It is easy to do. A rapid exchange of clothes and of baggage and Miss Cass drives away as Lady Elfreda, and Lady Elfreda drives away as Miss Cass.

It is all admirably told. Miss Cass finds that her rôle of aristocrat is by no means an easy one to play, and she lives in a state of continuous panic as she approaches the rapids of inevitable discovery. And Lady Elfreda is hardly better off as she discovers by practical experience the sort of treatment usually meted out to governesses. But all's well that ends well. No self-respecting author would allow Miss Cass actually to come to grief, and Mr. Snaith is not only self-respecting, but generous. Indeed we are inclined to think that Miss Cass has rather more luck than she is entitled to, but at least the error is on the right side.

THE ADVENTUROUS LADY. By J. C. Snaith. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

No Clue.

There can be no doubt that the young girl whose body is found on the lawn at Sloanehurst has been murdered, seeing that a dagger roughly constructed from a manicure file has been driven to her heart. It is fortunate that Mr. Jefferson Hastings, the famous criminologist, is staying at Sloanehurst at the time. But for him, who knows what might have happened? It is probable that young Wilton, the only member of the party to whom any motive for the murder can be attributed, would have found himself in hot water. But as this is a detective story we are at once assured of the innocence of any one whose guilt seems to be almost beyond question.

Apart from the ingenuity of the plot, the author may be congratulated on two or three striking successes in characterization.

THE MAITLANDERS.

They are not really Maitlanders yet, the ambitious young impresario of the Maitland Theatre not yet having had his new company working long enough together to get them into doing team-work smoothly and to leaving his impress on their work. Mr. Maitland is a hard-working man, and the marks of his toil on not particularly fertile soil are apparent. Several other people that were not in the cast of "The Devil's Disciple" are playing this week. And I noticed, on inspecting their attempts to render a Barrie play, that they did not do the obvious thing in acting, which is to be natural.

Easier said than done; but these young people ought, at least, to try to be simple. There were several anxiously worked-over effects. Lady Mary's ground-out English accent, the strident pettishnesses of the two sisters, the self-sufficiency of the Honorable Ernest, the pomposities of Lord Loam, the drawing-room elegances of the Lasenby family, and the first-act gaucheries of "Tweeny" which irresistibly reminded one of the Alice-in-Wonderland course in Reeling and Writing and Fainting in Coils—which were greatly in need of being sandpapered down into plausibility. However, this was a first night of a company not yet used to working together.

"The Admirable Crichton" is really a delightful comedy, and every time I see it—this is the third or fourth time—I take in some point I had not wholly absorbed before. Lord Loam, for instance: an amiable, likable old nincompoop who became "Daddy" on the democratic island. Barrie wishes to indicate that the old fellow, who supported his high rank in the English social structure with such feeble underpinnings of mentality to hold him up, was by nature a cheerful peasant full of good will, loving childish pleasures, the amities of sociability unhampered by the technique of the drawing-room, and given over to harmless, unashamed gluttony.

The instant the ship's officer appeared Lord Loam ceased to be real, and becomes a piece of self-assertive pomposity. He did not know it—Barrie wishes to intimate to us—but his happiness was over. Comforts would return, soft cushions, and obsequious service, and the cessation of work—which would shorten his life—but never again would he know the joys of being liked for himself as a cheerful, natural human being.

It was an ambitious undertaking to put on this piece, with its varied characterization, the deep social significance underlying its surface comedy, and the intricate stage carpenter-ship required for the third act. Considering that the Maitland is a little theatre and has a small stage the management, in respect to setting and appointments, grappled successfully with the difficulties. The costumes of the island home were particularly successful, and those in the second act were the best laugh-producers in the play.

Probably the tense histrionic self-consciousness of the company will calm down a bit when they get away from the dangerous shoals of pure comedy, and in Galsworthy's "The Eldest Son" their earnest endeavors will show better results. For Galsworthy is serenely natural, and the atmosphere of his plays is good for the tyro, who is apt to be baffled in his endeavors to render the comedy that has a touch of burlesque, a touch of farce, and an occasional scene of pure comedy.

ALCAZAREAN MELODRAMA.

It is melodrama's turn at the Alcazar, and the sleuth and his myrmidons are on hand again, hunting down the perpetrator of a gory deed. "9:45" bears a very strong resemblance to "The Crimson Alibi" in that a whole line of people believe that they have committed the murder, or near-murder, which is keeping the sleuths busy. As in that play an attempt is made to divert suspicion from the real culprit—for culprit the pistol-wielder turns out to be; they are often very tender with the near-murderers in these melodramas and to centre it on the blameless ones. You are generally safe to say, "Oh he—or she—didn't do it. The author won't let his hero—or heroine—commit murder." But I don't know; sometimes one slips up on this too obvious logic.

"9:45" is, like most of these pieces, built up like a piece of mechanism. But it serves very well for an evening's entertainment. It calls on a full cast, and there are several emotional bursts—from May Nannary as the mother, from Inez Ragan as one of the self-accusers, and from Emily Pinter in the rôle of the unsuspected but real offender. There are more than a fair proportion of jokes in the lines, and the play does very well as an agency for serving as an evening-passer.

It is not, however, a developing play. There is no characterization, and the acting is necessarily on stereotyped lines, so no one player made a special hit. Inez Ragan has a dangerous tendency to fall into a sort of plaintive drone, when things are going badly for the heroine, and in her rôle in "9:45" she exemplified this tendency. Rafael Brunetto as the master-sleuth—a rôle he has filled several times—showed his chronic fault of indistinctness. That young man needs to set tasks for himself in distinct and expressive speech. The fat rôle falls to the hands of Anna MacNaughton, who reeled off the humor of a peppery Irishwoman with due unctious.

SCOTT'S STANDARD.

Antonio Scotti is a singer who believes that opera should be more than a concert with costumes and scenery. His standing as a singer is very high, and those of his fellow-singers who have a deep respect for the vocal art have been known to acclaim him as the king of baritones in America, because of the perfection of the art with which he uses the fine voice that has served him so long and well. But there is a companion art which he places beside the vocal art in his administration of his operatic organizations, and that is the art of acting. In this respect his standard is very high, and the singers in his various organizations are stimulated by his high standards to express, histrionically, the best that is in them. It looks as if the Scotti season, which will open October 4th, is going to be the means of giving us something particularly choice.

Besides, he brings us something of the essence of the Metropolitan accomplishment, because by timing his tours to this Coast when the Metropolitan season is over, Signor Scotti secures a group of the younger Metropolitan singers, whose freshness and enthusiasm cause them to welcome continued work instead of rest.

Signor Scotti used to be one of the handsomest men on the New York stage, and his admirers pronounce him to be always a most striking figure in opera. He is master of make-up, in that he studies the psychology of character so closely that he is a totally different man in every character he represents. The sixteen principals he brings with him have all won their spurs both as singers and players, and the season to be opened next Monday at the Exposition Auditorium promises in every way to be a notable one.

THE "SALON FRANCAIS."

In accordance with their new policy of having an occasional French play the directors of the Salon Français engaged Mr. André Ferrier to give a couple of one-act plays last week. In "Monsieur Purgon" Mr. Ferrier, supported by Mr. Charles Fallon and Mlle. E. Pairrieres, presented a conventional but commendable impersonation of a dying Molière, who even in his last hours felt impelled to play an ironic joke that revealed the follies of erring human nature.

In "Le Bonhomme Jadis," however, Mr. Ferrier gave an excellent impersonation of a merry old dotard incorrigibly in love with life, youth, and love, even if he must take their joys vicariously. There was much joyous ebullience in this portrait of the old Latin pagan who is so benevolent a godpapa to young love, and who is so genuinely amazed and condemnatory of the comely youth who has never had a mistress. It is an eminently Latin portrait, and only a Latin could give it with the cheerful matter-of-courtness with which the French deal with such questions. Mr. Louis Arnoux is a very valuable aid to Mr. Ferrier in these little genre plays to which the French actor remains so constant, but in spite of her undoubted talent, Miss Tapie is altogether too juvenile in appearance, as yet, to assume adult rôles.

A DRAMATIC SCHOLARSHIP.

There was a try-out this year on this Coast for an Yvette Guilbert scholarship, and it was won by a Berkeley girl of Russian parentage, a Miss Eugenia Buyko, who has been seen a number of times in public, and who, when she has the right kind of an audience, earns admiration and appreciation.

The young lady is dowered markedly with the gift of emotional expression by means of pantomime dancing which is half posturing and song. She has the look of the artist, with her pale, expressive face framed in its dense black hair, and her graceful young body is a pliant instrument to her demands. Her most striking demonstration of her powers recalls Isadora Duncan's representation of an impassioned France rising superbly from the ignominy of slavery to face a new future of freedom won by a splendid revolt. Miss Buyko's representation depicts a shackled Russia down in the dust, weak, suffering, almost dying. The young artist's depiction of the bursting of the chains, the emergence from despair, and the joy of the delivered provides to the on-looker that thrill of emotion which we extend to a work of real art, and which is the surest guarantee of its genuineness.

She goes now to pass through the developing process which Mme. Guilbert can formulate better, probably, than any of our American teachers. And then—what? One looks a little sadly on the serious young artist with the spiritual side of her art so much in the ascendancy, and remembering our fashion shows, our revues, and our follies, one thinks, "Europe for her." For only through the cachet conferred by a European verdict will America pay attention to anything in stage art that is essentially serious.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Eyes of a Portrait.

Everybody has noticed that the eyes in some portraits follow one wherever he goes in the room. It is a bit uncanny to move about an apartment and have the eyes of a picture always upon one. Some superstitious persons are afraid to go into a picture gallery where portraits of their ancestors are to be found. The effect is simply an optical illusion and is secured by having the eyes in the portrait looking directly toward the front. Under such circumstances the pupil is necessarily in the middle, with an equal amount of "white" on each side. This relation does not vary at all with the position of the observer. No matter where you stand the pupil will be in the middle of the eye and the eye will seem to be looking at you.

Waste, Wanton and Otherwise

Whenever your water bill jumps up, there's a reason.

Either you are making use of the extra water, or it is being wasted into the sewer.

If you make use of all the water registered by the meter, you know whether it is used beneficially or extravagantly.

Our experience is that a good many consumers use water extravagantly. Very few let it run wantonly to waste.

Most water waste is due to heedlessness or ignorance.

It is caused by a leak that seems too trifling to warrant repair, or by a leak which is not suspected.

Most of the unsuspected leaks are toilet leaks. Toilet leakage can be quite heavy without your seeing or hearing the water running to waste.

If you want to keep your water bill within reasonable bounds, don't be careless with water; practice a sensible economy.

Don't neglect a leak because it seems trifling; keep your fixtures tight.

When you have reason to suspect leakage don't rest until the leak is located and repaired.

Call upon our Service Department for advice and assistance whenever you have a water problem to solve.

It is our policy to help you keep your water bill at a reasonable figure.

We don't relish charging for wasted water any more than you relish paying for it.

The Columbia Theatre.

The opening of the dramatic season at the Columbia Theatre will occur next Monday evening, when George M. Cohan's production of the successful mystery drama, "The Acquittal," by Rita Weiman, begins an engagement of two weeks. It will be presented by an excellently chosen cast which is under the personal supervision of Mr. Cohan. In the leading rôle, that of a Pacific Coast newspaper reporter, will be seen Harold Vermilye, who was seen at the Columbia last season as John Paul Bart in "A Tailor Made Man." The associate players include Marie Louise Walker, Kernan Cripps, Charles L. Douglass, Charles Mason, Mildred Southwick, Will T. Goodwin, William McFadden, Anthony Burger, Harriet Mayfield, John E. Sanders, William E. Hodges, and William Nelson.

Matinees will be given Wednesdays and Saturdays. This attraction will not play elsewhere in California.

The Curran Theatre.

"Another Griffith masterpiece" is what Eastern critics are calling the great producer's magnificent elaboration of "Way Down East," to be screened before its first San Francisco audience at the Curran Theatre tomorrow (Sunday) night.

Lottie Blair Parker's "Way Down East" is an American stage classic of more than twenty years' standing, one of the most famous of William A. Brady's dramatic triumphs. Griffith, with the unerring eye and sure touch of the artist, has made of the play a twelve-reel poem in pictures, said to be his finest production since "Hearts of the World." The impressive beauty of the natural settings chosen for "Way Down East" and the homely, convincing atmosphere throughout are said to be its outstanding features. Eight months' hard work and an expenditure of $783,000 are represented in "Way Down East."

Lillian Gish and Richard Barthelmess have again been chosen by Griffith as his featured players, Miss Gish appearing as unhappy, pathetic little Anna Moore, heroine of "Way Down East," with Barthelmess as Richard Bartlett, her boyish lover. Burr McIntosh and Vivian Ogden as Squire Bartlett and Martha Perkins have their old stage rôles. Lowell Sherman, Kate Brice, Creighton Hale, and Mary Hay are others in important parts.

"Buddies" will be shown at the Curran to-night for the last time.

The Alcazar Theatre.

The thrills of this week's mystery drama, "At 9:45," at the Alcazar will be followed at next Sunday's matinee by "A Cure for Curables," in which the eccentric comedian William Hodge acted with great success for a season at the Thirty-Ninth Street Theatre, New York. The play is founded on a popular story by Corra Harris, and is the joint work of Earl Derr Biggers, who wrote "Seven Keys to Baldpate," and Lawrence Whitman. It is an open secret that the latter is none other than Hodge himself, who is a fine actor with a keen sense of stage values. The "curables" are a group of blasé, fashionable hypochondriacs, gathered at a "rest cure" in the Blue Ridge Mountains of Virginia, willed to an optimistic young doctor upon condition that ten of his patients will certify to complete health restoration within a month. The doctor has a battle to win, and he goes at it in a most original way. There are more than twenty diverting types in an exceptionally large cast, headed by Dudley Ayres as the cheery, resourceful young physician, and Inez Ragan as the loveliest but most languid of his patients, who becomes his powerful ally when her heart is aroused.

Sunday, October 10th, brings Henry Arthur Jones' emotional play, "The Hypocrites." It is even more vital under present conditions than when produced in New York and London with sensational success by Charles Frohman.

The Orpheum.

Sheila Terry, who shines as next week's Orpheum luminary, has youth, appearance, personality, and ability. She can dance, sing, and act. Orpheum-goers will remember her for her visit here last season, at which time she headlined and scored a worthy success. Her musical romance, "Three's a Crowd," will be in three scenes. Miss Terry will have the assistance of Harry Peterson and Morris Lloyd.

The team of Harry Adler and Rose Dunbar, recently formed, will prove that Miss Dunbar is as capable in vaudeville as he has been in musical comedy and that Mr. Dunbar is as successful in his present field as he was in France. Together they are offering a travesty described as a "study from life."

"Jasper Junction," on the line between Nowhere and No Place, will be the offering of Jack Clifford and Miriam Wills, vaudevillians well known.

J. Rosamond Johnson, former partner of Bert Williams, and now a famous composer of popular airs, will come with his "inimitable five" in "Syncopation."

Welch, Mealy, and Montrose are a trio of gymnasts who do not take their work seriously. They actually burlesque their own calling.

La Graciosa will pose in a flood of light and color, depicting famous art reproductions. "Visions in Fairyland" is the title of her daring act. Osaki and Taki will be found to be phenomenal athletes. "Bits and Pieces," the musical review of this week, with Jack Patton and Loretta Marks, is to be the one holdover.

The Maitland Playhouse.

Arthur Maitland and his associate players will present one of John Galsworthy's notable plays, "The Eldest Son," at the Maitland Playhouse this coming week. This particular Galsworthy modern society drama has never been played in San Francisco, but it is widely known to lovers of the best in the theatre.

It deals with a high-bred English family whose eldest son has become enamored of a lady of low degree in the social scale. His family requires that a servant should marry to right a wrong, and when the same problem faces the son there are situations that bespeak the highest there is in the drama.

Arthur Maitland will be supported this week by Miss Mildred Cates, an actress who comes from Southern California with the best of recommendations.

Sir James Barrie's comedy-drama, "The Admirable Crichton," with Maitland as the butler, will close this Saturday night with a matinee as well.

Scotti Grand Opera.

Next Monday night at 8:15 San Francisco will have its first opportunity for fourteen years of hearing grand opera as given by the Metropolitan, the world's greatest opera house.

Antonio Scotti, the impresario on this occasion, has a special arrangement with the Metropolitan Opera House by which he can take his pick of the great singers of the Metropolitan by commencing his seasons before or after the regular season at the Metropolitan, and by avoiding New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Atlanta, Scotti does not come in competition with the Metropolitan, ever jealous of its fame and careful of its supremacy. Instead, the Scotti Grand Opera Company serves as a touring advertisement for the famous Metropolitan, and after which the Scotti Opera is patterned. Just what Signor Scotti's arrangement with the Metropolitan is has never been revealed, but it is a certainty that he and his company go their way with the friendliest feeling of Gatti-Casazza, general director of the Metropolitan, and the entire Metropolitan management. One has only to recall the vast sum that was paid by the Metropolitan people for the elimination of Oscar Hammerstein from the field of grand opera to banish any lingering doubt as to the entire willingness of the Metropolitan to have Scotti's venture grow and prosper.

Scotti's company has much of the young blood of the Metropolitan and the opportunity of Americans in the company is very gratifying. Scotti, always the greatest actor on the operatic stage, and whose singing is only second to his superbly ripened powers as an actor, is an ideal artistic director. He has only to apply to his company's productions the same feeling for dramatic values, the same taste for investiture, and the same pictorial treatment of ensemble scenes to assure performances that are well-nigh perfection.

The coming visit of the Scotti Grand Opera Company to San Francisco will be the greatest service to the cultural development of this great community, and it is a great satisfaction to know that Frank W. Healy will make it as great a success financially as Scotti will artistically.

Here is the repertory: Monday, October 4th, "La Bohème"; Tuesday, "L'Oracolo," followed by "Pagliacci"; Wednesday, "Faust"; Thursday, "Tosca"; Friday, "Il Trovatore"; Saturday (matinée), "Madama Butterfly"; (evening), "L'Oracolo," followed by "Cavalleria Rusticana"; Sunday (matinée), "La Bohème."

Symphony Orchestra.

Those who have attended the Auditorium concerts by the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra in the past will welcome the news that another of these popular concerts will be given in the Exposition Auditorium next Saturday evening, October 2d.

For this occasion an unusually attractive programme has been arranged in which something is sure to be found to appeal to all classes of music-lovers. For lovers of the classics two movements from Tchaikowsky's beautiful Pathétique Symphony will be offered, also Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture, No. 3. New orchestral arrangements will be played of two of Mendelssohn's most popular Songs Without Words—the Spring Song and the Spinning Song. The soloists on the programme will be Edwin Lemare at the organ, Horace Britt, cellist, and Louis Persinger, violinist.

The demand for seats for this concert has been unusually heavy and the huge hall will doubtless be crowded to its capacity, as has always been the case in the past when these "Pop" concerts were given.

"George White's Scandals of 1919," an elaborate New York musical show, will follow "The Acquittal" at the Columbia Theatre. David Belasco's "Tiger Rose" and "Listen Lester" are also coming.

Heraldic Apples.

The landscape gardener has so long and so persistently improved upon nature that now the fruit-grower thinks he has a right to try. Any person who wants a supply of apples bearing his family crest has only to send an illustration of it to certain growers at Montreuil, France, and he will duly receive the fruit the following season by paying the price.

The desired end is attained by growing the apples in paper bags, and these are slipped on when the fruit is about the size of a walnut. Being thus sheltered from the sun, the apples do not color as they swell, and when fully grown still remain green or yellow.

As soon as they reach their maximum size the bags that cover them are replaced by others, on the side of which the desired crest or coat of arms has been cut like a stencil. The sun can now penetrate to that part of the apple exposed and redden it thoroughly, so that when the bag is again withdrawn the device is seen standing out in red upon the green surface.

To obtain the opposite result—that is, a green device on a red ground—the second bag is not used, but the pattern is cut out in paper and stuck on to the fruit, the sun coloring all the exposed parts but leaving green the crest or other device which the paper forms.

Many Parisian fruiterers exhibit for sale apples with the coat of arms of the Allied countries printed upon them; others have them with monograms, Christian names, arrow-pierced hearts, and other tender devices.

VANITY FAIR.

Why should it require a ruling by a state supreme court to determine that a woman need not state her age in order to qualify as a voter? The Supreme Court of Maine has so decided, after a hearing held at considerable expense. There is no law requiring a woman to state her age, nor a man either for that matter. The law states that a voter shall be twenty-one years of age, and a statement that the intending voter is actually of that age is all that any official has a right to demand. Why do we allow our little jacks-in-office to make such pestilential asses of themselves?

This craving of a long-eared officialism to know our ages is one of the curious psychological problems of the day. It may be said that the corresponding craving of the public, and particularly of the feminine public, to conceal its age is another one, but this is hardly true. It is a peculiarly personal matter, this of one's age, and nearly every one resents the question. It may not be very reasonable, but then, thank heaven, we are not yet governed by reason. There is no particular reason why a man should resent being asked to state his pet name for his wife, but he does and always will. We all like to have a little private place within ourselves stocked with our small private facts, and we do not wish to have it invaded. One of those facts is our age, and women are peculiarly sensitive about it.

If we want a passport to go to a foreign country we must not only state our age, but prove it by means of a birth certificate. If we can not produce a birth certificate or some corresponding proof—and a great many people can not—then we can not go to the foreign country. The idea underlying this idiocy is the very proper one that the travel of juveniles ought to be under some sort of supervision at the present time, but this is made the excuse for demanding of a man of seventy whose name is perhaps known to every intelligent person in the country that he submit legal proof that he is over twenty-one before he can be allowed to visit Paris. No one has yet explained to us why a statement of age should be sufficient in the case of a voter, while the traveler must not only state his age, but prove it. But then who would expect any sign of human intelligence from officialism?

Justice Russell Benedict of the supreme court, Brooklyn, believes that he has discovered a remedy for the divorce evil. Our own private opinion is that we have done the same thing, but whereas Justice Benedict hastens to announce his remedy to the whole world, wild horses would not compel us to divulge our own particular panacea—not, at least, until free speech has been reestablished in America.

Justice Benedict disapproves of a new law by the New York legislature to the effect that the guilty party in a divorce suit may henceforth marry after three years instead of five. It is a move, says the justice, in the wrong direction. Either party to a divorce suit ought to be prohibited from marriage during the lifetime of the other party. It is the desire to remarry that leads to the divorce suit. If this temptation were removed there would be but few divorces. How easy it all seems. Attacks are constantly being made, says the justice, on the "sanctity of marriage." They must be resisted, says the justice. They are socialistic, says the justice. But what can the courts do in the matter so long as the legislature resolutely sets its face in the other direction?

Would that we only had the courage to clear our minds of cant, to avoid the set phrase that means nothing, to shun the stereotype. Actually there is nothing at all sacred about marriage. How can there be anything sacred about a gabbled ceremony before a judge or a commissioner? But there is something decidedly sacred about love, and we need not be too conventional or artificial in our definitions of love. Justice Benedict seems to mean that there is something sacred about the continued union of two people who hate and despise each other, and that at all costs they must be prevented from making new unions with people whom they love.

The error that all these good people make is to confuse the marriage ceremony with the marriage. Now we can quite easily prevent the marriage ceremony to any extent that we please. We can hedge it around with such restrictions as to make it practically impossible. But we can not prevent or hinder marriage. If we had any wisdom in such matters, which of course we have not, nor in any others, we should adjust our regulations to the true marital impulses, since by no means whatever can we adjust marital impulses to our regulations. The last vestige of "sanctity" in marriage matters disappeared with the arrival of the civil ceremony. So long as marriages were celebrated only by the churches it was always possible to preserve the illusion of sanctity. But to attribute sanctity to a civil ceremony hardly to be distinguished from the signing of a lease became too hollow a pretense for preservation. With all due respect to Justice Benedict it may be said that there is a growing and now general conviction that we have talked so much cant about marriage that we no longer have the power to look facts in the face.

Alice Brown, writing in the North American Review for October under the title of "The Madness of Man," says:

"What dreams we had in the days following our awakening in 1917, of the new earth at ease under a heaven friendly because it was unobscured, when we should have cleaned out the Augean stables filthy from the awakening of Barbarossa's horsemen! In that moment of anguish we were, for a heart's beat of terrified recognition, actually on the way back to old allegiances. The bravest rushed to cover in poetry and the thought of God. We believed with an eager credulity that mankind had at last learned that final lesson. The old injustices were dead. The phrase was current everywhere, that those who had bought us that bright guerdon 'must not die in vain.' Our girls, in uniformed vigor, did the most mental and most daring deeds with a sober efficiency. We said that woman, too, was set free from the toils of custom. She need no more assert her equality with man in the sterner virtues, for she had accepted the supreme challenge and endured the ordeal, chaste as Artemis, fearless as the Amazonian queens. What did she do, poor prisoner to her own abrogated instincts, when the armistice, which was no peace, but a new complexity of strife, stripped her of emergency clothes and her emergency frame of mind? She who had won freedom for her rhythmic muscles stepped into a skirt no wider than her brothers' trouser leg and went hobbling along in it down the tittering aisles of time. She mounted on the fool's dais of highest heels to peg about the more uncertainly, she painted over the bloom of her beauty with the cosmetics predicted by Mrs. Tanqueray for the raddled face of the passé demi-monde, and went forth in abbreviated chiffon to dance, 'cheek to cheek,' dances as ugly as provocative.

"She is the astounding enlivener of a late best-seller that is said, in an authoritative quarter, to embody the 'glorious spirit of abounding youth,' and if the portrait of her as therein set forth is no libel, but a true copy, she is the pitiable victim of precocious sex recognitions. One of the pseudo-intellectual bromides of the present confusion of mental values is 'class consciousness.' She is the bizarre embodiment of an undigested sex consciousness. She is the wantoning reaction against what this tell-tale novel of 'abounding youth' calls the 'hypocritical era.' Was the era of restrained discussion and modesty of mien and dress entirely hypocritical? Is mere decency of demeanor hypocrisy? Decency, one is inclined to say, is like a clean shirt. You may be very dirty under it, but you'd better have the shirt. Now, I do not believe that girlhood in her present phase of moral and physical high kicking is of necessity more attractive to the young manhood with any sort of tradition behind it than if she did not unveil her beauties to sun, moon, and planets seven. Difference, not mimicry, was ever the more piquing. And she still loves, with all the fierceness nature planted in her, to attract her mate. She has not changed in that. The old-time impulse of surging blood and waking heart is in her as it was in those other maids, Perdita and Desdemona of sweet, fragrant memory—Juliet, too, and Beatrice and Rosalind, for though in them the tides of life rose mountain high and swamped the dykes, yet were they of such a genius of fine behavior as to be still of beauties all compact. No, the rowdy young girl of present day portrayals, she who has no more eloquent rebuttal of her elders than to bid them 'shut up,' she is still the challenger of love. But why challenge so whoopingly, why 'spoil the bread and spill the wine'? There is but one answer: because she, too, is the victim of a time so palpably 'out of joint.' The germs of world madness have settled upon her also and bred in her a grotesque travesty of youth."

Animals Dream Like Men.

Aristotle's history of animals declares that horses, oxen, sheep, goats, dogs, and all viviparous quadrupeds dream. Pliny in his natural history specifies the same animals. Buffon describes the dreams of animals. Macnisch calls attention to the fact that horses neigh and rear in their sleep, and affirms that cows and sheep, especially at the period of raising their young, dream.

Darwin in the "Descent of Man" says that "dogs, cats, horses, and probably all the higher animals, even birds, as is stated on good authority, have vivid dreams, and this is shown by their movements and voice."

George John Romanes in his "Mental Evolution in Animals" says that the fact that dogs dream is proverbial, and quotes Seneca and Lucretius, and furnishes proof from Dr. Lauder Lindsay, an eminent authority, that horses dream.

Bechstein holds that the bullfinch dreams, and gives a case where the dream took on the character of a nightmare, and the bird fell from its perch, and four great authorities say that dreaming becomes so vivid as to lead to somnambulism.

Guer gives a case of a somnambulist watchdog which prowled in search of imaginary strangers or fowls, and exhibited toward them a whole series of pantomimic actions, including barking. Dryden says: "The little birds in dreams the songs repeat."

Frederick Burlingham, American explorer, just returned from central Borneo, tells of methods employed by natives to protect young children from wild boar, boa constrictors, and poisonous insects. The children are swathed in garments and swung on rattan vines suspended between trees. Crocodiles take a large toll of children in Borneo, says the explorer, despite precautions taken.

Within forty miles of Portland, Oregon, a mountain voyager recently discovered three fine waterfalls each with a drop of more than 100 feet. Although the city can be seen from the spot, it is believed that no white man had ever before visited the falls.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

George, three years of age, appeared on the Easter programme at his Sunday-school in Greenwood, singing a solo. As he was leaving the church with his mother a friend said to him: "George, you did fine." "I know it," he replied. His mother, reproving him, said: "Why, George, you should not have said that to the lady." Whereupon George answered: "Well, mother, I guess I could hear my own voice."

"Come upstairs and let me wash your hands," said Winnie's mother. "I don't want to go up," wailed Winnie, aged three. "Let her wash them down here," called grandma, "she can do it just as well." "No," her mother said firmly, "I want her to come up with me." Winnie came upstairs as slowly as possible. "Oh," she said, turning a wrathfully tearful face to her mother, "why don't you obey your mother?"

Bishop Hoss said at a Nashville picnic: "The religious knowledge of too many adults resembles, I am afraid, the religious knowledge of little Eve. 'So you attend Sunday-school regularly?' the minister said to little Eve. 'Oh, yes, sir.' 'And you know your Bible?' 'Oh, yes, sir.' 'Could you perhaps tell me something that is in it?' 'I could tell you everything that's in it.' 'Indeed.' And the minister smiled. 'Do tell me, then.' 'Sister's beau's photo is in it,' said little Eve, promptly, 'and ma's recipe for vanishin' cream is in it, and a lock of my hair cut off when I was a baby is in it, and the ticket for pa's watch is in it.'"

Julian G. Herkimer of the Anti-Saloon League said in a Pittsburg lecture: "A Pittsburg woman, in the days before the state went dry, took a bath one winter evening and then as she felt chilled she swallowed a table-spoonful of whisky. Afterward she prepared her little daughter for bed. She was bending over the youngster, unbuttoning her frock, when the child gave two or three sniffs and said sharply: 'Why, mother, you've been using father's perfumery!'"

John Bunton was certainly a steady man; but he was a bit too steady for Clara Hopkins. They had been engaged to be married fifteen years, and still he had never asked her to name the happy day. One evening John called in a romantic frame of mind, and asked Clara to sing something tender and touching—something that would move him. After a moment's thought she sat down at the piano and sang an old ballad with meaning. It was entitled, "Darling, I Am Growing Old."

A conceited Welsh student-pastor was preaching in English in a Derbyshire chapel. To impress his English hearers he said he would recite the first words of the Bible in twenty languages. What he did was to recite different passages in Welsh each time. Suddenly he saw a man laughing at him. "And twelfthly," he said, "as the passage goes in Arabic, 'Oschwi Cymro peidwch yn chwethin a caewch eich ceg,'" which means "if you're a Welshman, stop laughing and shut your mouth."

In an ancient mansion which recently changed hands on account of the ups and downs of war-time fortunes there dwells and works a parlor maid of very expensive and rather cultured and superior type. Her mistress does not mind the expense, but is often much bothered by the culture, this being on too high a plane for her understanding. "Ma'am," said the maid, meeting her mistress in the hall, "there is a mendicant at the door." "Then tell him," said the mistress of the mansion, "we have nothing to mend."

Those Uncut Pages.

I love to read of castles gray,
And maidens held in prisons dreary;
I thrill to learn the dashing way,
The armored knight unlocks his dearie.
But when I read a throbbing tale
Where youthful blood unchafed rages,
Please, hookman, hearken to my wail—
I hate to stop to cut the pages.

A hook of perils deftly wrought
Excites my dull imagination.
The test of strength unflinching sought
Compels my instant admiration.
With muscles tense I watch the fight,
The spill of gore my thirst assuages,
But when the row is at its height
I hate to stop to cut the pages.

Detective yarns my thoughts ensnare;
I give such stories rapt attention,
When sleuths start out to do and dare,
My nerves are taut with apprehension.
I like to note the skillful trick
As law with crime the contest wages,
But when the plot is growing thick
I hate to stop to cut the pages.

When lovers meet beneath the bough,
I find the paragraphs dramatic,
As hand in hand they pledge their vow,
Each sentence holds a thrill ecstatic.
As moonbeams glint the sylvan dell,
They swear to love adown the ages:
When love is young and bosoms swell,
I hate to stop to cut the pages.

—Hinton Gilmore in Judge.

"There's one thing I can't understand about these spirit communications," remarked Mr. Brown as he finished reading the account of a highly successful séance. "What's that, John, dear?" asked his wife. "Why, you never hear of a departed soul having gone any other place except straight to heaven."—Houston Post.

MESSAGE OF THE FIRST DESIGNATE ACTING PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF GUATEMALA TO THE NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY ON THE OPENING OF ITS EXTRAORDINARY SESSIONS, SEPTEMBER 3d, 1920.

HONORABLE NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY: Today, when the representatives of the people of Guatemala convene in extraordinary sessions, I most respectfully tender them my greetings.

This congress, which with its patriotic and firm action achieved the great task of freeing our country, has granted the signal honor of entrusting me with the Presidency of the Executive Power in those extraordinary and transcendental circumstances for the Republic which are now so well known to our congressmen.

In those circumstances, essentially abnormal and difficult, the situation demanded exceptional and urgent measures, not only to maintain public order and to most effectively implant loyalty, so long forgotten, but also to start the reorganization of the affairs of the Republic. Hence, the arduous task before the Executive in all the branches of the public administration and in the various political and social spheres in order to be able to lead the country through the ample field of liberty, justice and progress, which we have so much coveted for our country and to which she has perfect right in order to develop its life and labor for the sake of its prosperity and greatness.

Aside of the two important matters which demanded the calling to meeting of this High Body, I must set forth brief considerations on the course of the affairs of the Republic during the short period elapsed.

The patriotism of the Guatemalans as well as their energy, laboriousness and prudence, in sound and well-meaning cooperation, have been important factors to successfully undertake the so much desired work of reparation and concord and, above all, to be able to save the country in such abnormal circumstances. In this connection it is gratifying for me to state that, without exception of political color or of religious beliefs, every one responded to the call that had to be made to conjure the revolution and anarchy which threatened the Republic and to proceed with all effort and determination to the national reconstruction.

Following democratic precepts, from the very beginning all activities and services of the Administration had to be segregated so that national labor should be largely distributed to render beneficial results to all.

The reorganization of Public Finances, Public Instruction, the Army and Agriculture demanded the very first attention of the Government, and the task of ameliorating the financial condition of the country has been continuous, not only to attend to the complex and peremptory needs, but also to initiate an era of honest administration, indispensable to regulate the collection, management and investment of public funds, on behalf of the credit and prosperity of the Republic.

CARLOS HERRERA
President of the Republic of Guatemala

The civil administration has been attended with the best possible zeal and the State Offices and Municipalities have begun a fruitful task abundant in good results for the people who have been anxious of a reform.

Special and constant care has been given by the Executive to the organization and improvement of the Army of the Republic, that same may reach the deserved place as faithful defender of the autonomy of the country and of its institutions.

Public Charity has had the particular and preferential attention which such an important branch requires to fill a national necessity, felt and wanted by all.

The Department of Justice, with entire free action, has performed its august functions and the Executive has given it all the support it deserves.

I am glad to inform the representative of the people that the era of complete freedom which has been initiated has afforded all the inhabitants of the Republic the enjoyment of their rights and constitutional guarantees, without any restriction, always following the written rule that each and every one of us shall perform his duty.

Pursuant to the wishes of the Nation, the Government has renewed its relations with all the countries on a sincere, frank and loyal friendship, laying particular stress on the fraternal note with the sister Republics of Central America with the object in view and noble spirit of bringing to reality the great ideal of the rebuilding of our ancestors' country, an ideal which has been so cherished by the true patriots. I also have the great satisfaction of informing you that the civilized world has given its spontaneous and noble applause to the brilliant awakening of our country to the life of Liberty and Justice.

On April 20th of this year, and in compliance with constitutional precept, the people were summoned to cast their vote at the polls, in the legitimate exercise of their rights, to vote for the person who is to be the President of the Republic during the next legal period.

The elections, carried out with the most absolute liberty during the last week in August, were held throughout the Republic in perfect order, strict measures having been issued to fully protect the right to vote. This once more has placed in evidence the civism and prudence of the Guatemalans and the electoral statements are the best proof of it.

The honorable Representatives are well aware of the fervent and unanimous national desire to accomplish the reform of our Political Constitution, which is the supreme text on which our liberties must rest and this opinion of the whole country has been let known by the press and by the propaganda of the militant political parties. A large number of Municipalities of the Republic, encouraged by the echo of those great aspirations of the People, have appealed to the Executive soliciting its mediation with the Legislative Power on that important issue, and the various petitions have been submitted to the consideration of that High Body.

In order that the representatives of the people may prove the results of the effected elections, issue the declaratory prescribed by law and give possession to the person elected to discharge the functions of President of the Republic during the coming period, and in order that it may resolve what it may deem proper on behalf of the country on the very important constitutional reform demanded by the people, the Executive, in fulfillment of its duty, has convened this High Body to the present extraordinary sessions.

This opportunity affords me deep satisfaction in sincerely wishing that the important and transcendental deliberations of the National Assembly may have the beneficial success demanded by patriotism for the welfare of the Republic on the magnificent path of Liberty, conquered forever and heroically by the noble Guatemalan nation!

To the Honorable Representatives of the People.

Dr. and Mrs. Harold Brunn are being congratulated upon the birth of a daughter.

Hotel Whitcomb.

The popularity of bridge among society folk has prompted the Hotel Whitcomb to give a "bridge-tea" next Tuesday afternoon in the picturesque Sun Lounge of that hotel. In making the announcement of this tea event Mr. J. H. Van Horne stated there's going to be a surprise for all who attend. Just what the surprise consists of is a closely guarded secret and will only be divulged on the afternoon of the tea. The "bridge-tea," which will be held Tuesday afternoon, October 5th, from 2:30 to 4:30, is the second of a series of special tea events the Hotel Whitcomb plans for its winter programme.

New Flower Shop.

At the opening of the new flower shop on Saturday by the Suzanne Art Floral Decorators upwards of 1500 people visited the place. The owners are recently from Paris, France, where they also conduct a similar establishment. The Suzanne Art Floral Shop at 468 Geary Street is one of the most artistically appointed places of its kind in the West.

The Gold Cup, which rewards the winner of the chief event at the Ascot meeting, is perhaps the most coveted prize of the English turf. It has had a varied history. In 1807 the first race for the Gold Cup was witnessed by George III's queen and "the three princesses in white Spanish mantles and the Prince of Wales glorious in hotten-green." Thirty-seven years later the Czar Nicholas I was so delighted with the race for the cup that he begged to be allowed to substitute a piece of plate, which, appropriately enough, was won the following year by Lord Albemarle's Emperor, so named in honor of the Czar. This "Emperor's Plate" was a very handsome trophy, being a reduced copy of the famous statue of Peter the Great at Petrograd, ornamented with figures of Russian soldiers and with views of Windsor Castle, the Kremlin, and the Winter Palace. When the Crimean war broke out the Gold Cup regained the place of honor.

"Your new clerk seems industrious." "He has just started to work for us." "You anticipate that he will slow up after a while?" "I'm sure of it. Tomorrow or the next day he will begin to notice that we have some good-looking stenographers about the premises."—Birmingham-Age-Herald.

Curious Facts About Money.

While hooks of reference will say that the first actual coining of money was by Pheidon, King of Argos, in 895 B. C., it must not be supposed that there had not existed a keen appreciation of the value and uses of money for centuries previous to the introduction of coinage. The ancient Egyptians had a gold and silver standard of currency, and their money was in the form of gold and silver ornaments, rings and nuggets, the value of which depended upon weight.

The Greeks improved upon this by marking the weight upon the gold and the silver nuggets, so that it would not be necessary to weigh them at every place. Next came the gold, silver, and copper nuggets of graded uniform sizes and value. After that there was the molding and stamping of disks made from the precious metals.

Some of the first coins were enormous, the idea apparently being to discourage the greedy from attempting to accumulate and carry around too many of them. There were copper coins as large as dinner plates. This inconvenient style had to give way to the demand for smaller and more convenient forms of currency, and the giant pennies soon dwindled in size to meet the popular demand.

The earliest trace of the use of gold as money is to be found in the pictures of the ancient Egyptians weighing in scales heaps of rings of the precious metals. But there is no actual record that these rings were known as coins with a fixed value.

Iron, according to Aristotle, was once extensively employed as currency. Lead has also served as money—in fact, it still does in Burma. Copper has been more widely employed as money than either of the two last-mentioned metals. The Hebrew coins were composed chiefly of it, while down to 269 B. C. the sole Roman coinage was an alloy of copper.

Tin money was once used in England, probably on account of the rich tin mines in Cornwall. Early English coinages contained much of this tin money, principally in the form of farthings and half-pence.

Silver formed the basis for the early Greek coins, and was used in Rome first in 269 B. C. Mediaeval money was first composed of silver.

Tea Tales

"Aunt Theodora, please have your reception some other afternoon."

"Why, Dorothy?"

"Because all our set are planning to go to the Bridge Tea at Hotel Whitcomb next Tuesday afternoon. And I do want to go so badly."

"Really, dear?"

"Yes, really and truly. I think you ought to invite a few friends and come too. Bridge has such a fascination for you, you know."

A "Bridge Tea," the second of a series of special tea events, will be held at Hotel Whitcomb, Tuesday afternoon, October 5th, from 2:30 to 4:30. Cards are provided. There is no admission or cover charge.

The Swiss people were the first to date their coinage. They introduced the dated coin four hundred years ago and the style was adopted in all countries in a very short time.

The coin of the smallest value ever issued is the "mite," so-called, such as the widow of the Bible contributed to the poor. Its shape was hexagonal, and its value about one-fiftieth of a cent. It would take five thousand mites to make one American dollar.

"Don't you want to leave footprints on the sand of time?" "I do not. I'd rather leave motor tracks."—Houston Post.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Butler (in service of Earl of Kylacs)—Is that you, my lord? Burglar (full of guile)—Yus, matey.—Punch.

"Three halls!" yelled the umpire. "Now's your chance to soak it," shouted the excited pawnbroker's clerk to the batsman.—Boston Transcript.

"How's business?" "Not too good—thanks to some dishonest rascals who are selling goods at reasonable prices."—Le Journal Annusant (Paris).

Peddler—I'm trying to sell some almanacs to make a living. Won't you help me out? Busy Man—I certainly will, if you don't go of your own accord.—Boston Transcript.

"What kind of a time is he having on his motor trip?" "Guess he's having a pretty lively time. He sent me a picture postcard of a hospital."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Muggins—It's strange that Wigwag doesn't succeed. He seems to have no difficulty in catching on. Buggins—Maybe the trouble is he doesn't know when to let go.—Philadelphia Record.

Lady (at bank teller's window)—I wish to open an account with you. Teller—All right, madam. How much do you want to deposit? Lady—Why, nothing. I want to draw out fifty dollars.—Life.

"These love scenes are rotten. Can't the leading man act like he is in love with the star?" "Can't act at all," said the director. "Trouble is, he is in love with her."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"Why don't you join a golf club?" "Man, I don't know how to play golf." "That's no reason. Ninety per cent. of the golf club members don't know how to play the game either."—Detroit Free Press.

Head of Firm—How long do you want to be away on your wedding trip? Hinks (timidly)—Well, sir—er—what would you say? Head of Firm—How do I know? I haven't seen the bride.—Toledo Blade.

"The man was in a reverie and the lady was in a tantrum. They collided." "The man was in what?" "A reverie. And the lady was in a tantrum." "I suppose both machines were badly damaged?"—Detroit Free Press.

"Do you think Gladys was surprised when I proposed to her?" inquired the happy youth. "About as surprised," answered Miss Cayenne,

The Gallagher Incident.

In tucking away a few bottles of claret under the seat of his automobile by way of provision for a week-end trip into the country "Andy" Gallagher, sealer of weights and measures, late member of the board of supervisors, a professional trafficker in labor politics, did only what many other and better men are doing every day. Mr. Gallagher's special dereliction appears to have been in getting caught, though something might be said on the score of moral obligation on the part of a man under oath to sustain the Constitution and the statutes of the land. It is to be noted in connection with this incident that Mr. Gallagher protested seizure of the machine in which his precious liquids were being conveyed on the ground that it was a "municipal automobile." By what authority was Mr. Gallagher, albeit sealer of weight and measures, albeit a former member of the board of supervisors, even albeit a professional trafficker in labor politics—by what authority, let us ask, was Mr. Gallagher using a municipal automobile for a week-end jaunt into the country? There is as we recall it a municipal ordinance, at least theoretically in force, to the effect that municipal automobiles must be used only for municipal purposes. And it is further recalled that when the restrictive ordinance was proposed it had the support of Mr. Gallagher, who was a member of the board of supervisors. Verily it is a liberal construction of the rule limiting the use of municipal automobiles to municipal business that would include week-end trips into the country by Mr. Gallagher, not to mention employment in the illegal business of transporting alcoholic liquids. But perhaps we are captious. A city that elects "Andy" Gallaghers to one municipal post after another deserves precisely what it gets at their hands.

Handicaps Upon Marriage.

Subject to determination by popular vote at the coming election there is pending a measure changing the laws of California relative to community property—that is, property acquired after marriage by industry or business as distinct from inheritance or gift. This measure is revolutionary in that it is designed to overthrow a long-established community-property law under which when the wife dies all the community property belongs to the surviving husband. The wife has no power to dispose of any of it by will. When the husband dies the wife takes one-half as an heir of the husband. The other half the husband can dispose of by will. If he dies without a will it goes to his children, and if there are no children then to his heirs-at-law. The theory of the existing law is that the husband is the owner of the community property subject to the right of the wife to maintenance in the lifetime of the husband and at his death to one-half of the property accumulated in the period of marriage. The theory of the pending proposal is that the wife becomes actual owner of one-half of the community property when it is acquired, and that upon the death of the husband she becomes the owner of all such property, limited only by his right to pass half of it by will to his children.

The proposed changes would cut deep into a system of such long standing as to have become a fixed condition in the life of the country. It would invalidate every will in existence. It would destroy the financial credit—in many instances more than the material value—of many businesses. It would make it possible for a wife, dying before her husband, to put upon him an unwelcome partner with full and unquestioned right to half-interest in all his business affairs. All this—and more, since we here touch only upon leading features of the proposed measure—proceeds upon the idea, not that the wife is entitled to maintenance during the husband's lifetime and after, but that she is an actual partner in his business operations with ownership and right of disposition by will in all respects identical with him. It ignores or denies any obligation of responsibility on the part of a husband to his collateral kin, to his business associates, to his friends, or to the public. A man may not, without the written approval of his wife, leave a penny to his mother or sister—to anybody except his direct descendants. And if he has none, he may not make a will at all.

That there are defects in the present laws as they relate to community property is admitted. Legislation in this respect has not in the past half-dozen years kept pace with changes in the taxing system. It is, for example, a patent injustice that a wife must pay inheritance dues upon the share of a community property that comes to her automatically upon the death of the husband. At this and at other points the law relative to community property is subject to revision in the interest of women. And here it is pertinent to remark that legislatures are invariably ready and eager to respond to appeals made in equity and propriety for protection or advancement of the legal rights of women. It was this disposition that led the legislature of 1919 to enact, with scant scrutiny of their social and other effects, the changes above set forth, and which are now subject under referendum to popular vote.

Broadly speaking, thoughtful men of all professions and ranks see in the proposed changes in the community property law a menace to existing social order. It would vastly complicate business by making formal consent of the wife, in her character of co-partner, essential to every transaction. By bringing a feminine partnership into every business it would limit if indeed it did not destroy the credit which attaches to the personality of the man doing business and to confidence in his good faith and business discretion. If the proposed measure is adopted no prudent man who has dependents will risk marrying except upon the basis of a pre-arranged marriage settlement, which would intrude a mercenary feature into a relationship which Americans like to regard as founded and sustained upon higher motives and which would thereby lose much of its moral flavor.

Mr. Garret McEnerney, the well-known lawyer, has spoken in emphatic protest against the change, which in his judgment would be disastrous. Upon this point he says:

Thousands of men are engaged in commercial business and other enterprises in this state in which their entire capital is composed of community property. If the wife of such a man dies his business stops. Administration must take place at least as to one-half thereof, and the financial sacrifices that must be made will necessarily be very great. I do not suppose the authors of the bill understood this effect and clearly the legislature did not. I can not understand how any self-respecting woman would wish to inflict such injury upon her surviving heirs, especially with respect to property which, in the majority of cases, has been largely the result of her husband's exertions and ability. Imagine the consternation of the head of a family, conducting a large business, on realizing that a partnership which he had long denied to an unfriendly stepson, or an arbitrary son-in-law, or even to his own wayward boy, dear to his mother's heart, had been in effect created by the will if his wife, whose mother love had outrun her prudence!

In the pending proposal, with various other suggestions made by a hysterically advanced group of feminine agitators, there are potentialities which do not appear to have been taken into account. First, the effect upon character of obligations attaching to the relationship of husband, father, son, brother, etc. Much of what is proposed in the name of equity for women would in its effects substitute legal for moral responsibility. A revised scheme of laws would relieve men of a species of duty that has had its part—and a very important part—in the making of manly character. In minor ways it is already observable that in taking on a competitive relation to men women have lost something very precious as related to their own interest and happiness, and that correspondingly men have lost much that tended to dignity and character. Take the institution of marriage, for example. Under the universal conception of things the man assumes support of the wife and the family. It is a responsibility very serious in its way and so regarded by all worthy men. It is a responsibility that may well gird a man to his highest powers and to which he should have the privilege of addressing his energies wholly unrestrained. If laws are to be so devised as to put upon a man at his marriage a whole series of limitations, the effect inevitably will be to make men of prudence and of a high sense of responsibility take sober second thought. To put it bluntly, every handicap put upon men at marriage is a handicap upon the marriage institution. And it hardly needs to be added that the interests neither of men nor of women, nor of common morality, are promoted when the marriage rate falls off. It is a very serious matter truly, and the busy agitators who in thirst for change, and in desire to mix in affairs, are attempting to make over men and women, despite their physical and mental differences, after a common model—all this in the name of equality—would do well to have a care.

Many minds are obsessed by the idea that women can be made and ought to be made in all ways "equal," as if equality in creatures in many and essential ways different were possible. If God Almighty in His wisdom had desired to make men and women equal in the sense of being competent for the same tasks and subject to the same responsibilities He would have made them less varied in design. It is true that men and women may be rendered legally equal in the sense of having identical rights and duties, but it would be an artificial process and one of questionable value. If men and women are to be equal in the sense the social theorists propose, then there must be identity of responsibility. Law and custom now put upon men definite responsibilities, among them the obligation of supporting their womankind and the children of their households. A wife may go into court and compel support by the husband; and may upon his failure from any cause win cancellation of the marriage contract. Are the social renovators willing to so modify law and custom as to make the obligation of family support, as it relates to men and women, identical? Is it desired to relieve men of the responsibilities to which they are obligated by instinct, custom, and law, and to place these responsibilities in equal measure upon women? Practically it can't be done, since neither men nor women are built that way. Women can no more relieve men of the special duties that nature and instinct have placed upon men than men can relieve women of the special obligations—notably that of child-bearing—imposed by nature upon women.

The illogical and impossible effort to make men and women "equal" at all points must in practice work out to the disadvantage of women. Men are stronger than women. They can endure heavier labors more hours in a day and more days in a month than women. Put men and women into competition with each other on terms of brutal equality, take out of the hearts and the practice of men consideration and favor to women, take out of the hearts and practice of women sympathy and the home-spirit, and the race would speedily fall back to the low moral level where physical strength enslaves and rules physical weakness. Already we see something of this degenerative movement in a marked decline in social manners. Time was within the memory of many of us not yet old when in places public and private women enjoyed at the hands of men a species of consideration now pretty generally withheld. Is it desired that this movement shall go on in the descending scale until every practice of what has been styled chivalry shall be thrown over and lost? In brief do those who insistently prate about equality of the sexes really and truly want equality? And if they do, do they understand what equality in all things means? Do they realize its awful menace to the status of women and its equal menace to the character of men?

Hot Shot in an Issue of Veracity.

In an address at St. Louis last week Senator Spencer stated that at the peace conference President Wilson promised American military aid to Roumania and Serbia in certain contingencies. A day or two later Secretary Tumulty gave out a statement to the effect that what Senator Spencer had said was "absolutely and unqualifiedly false." Answering Tumulty's statement, Senator Spencer declared that he did not believe the President had authorized such a denial. Then in a curt note to Senator Spencer President Wilson endorsed the Tumulty statement with the added remark, "I reiterate the denial. The statement you made was false." To this Senator Spencer replied under date of Tuesday of this week, quoting a statement in the stenographic notes of the eighth plenary session of the peace conference, in which President Wilson is reported to have said to Premier Bratianu of Roumania: "You must not forget that it is force that is the final guaranty of the public peace. If the world is again troubled the United States will send to this side of the ocean their army and their fleet." To this Senator Spencer added:

The statement was made upon the floor of the Senate on February 2, 1920, by Senator Reed, and, so far as I have learned, has never been denied until now. It has been widely circulated over the United States. If you did not make that statement to Premier Bratianu, I should be much indebted if you will be good enough to inform me.

Three questions are involved in this controversy: one of veracity, one concerning the integrity of an official report, one of memory. It is just possible that the presidential mind has been operating on its famous "one track." It has done so before.

Executive Nullification of Law.

The provision of the Jones Snipping Act which the President arbitrarily nullifies was designed to place a weapon in the hands of the United States for use in the warfare of competition in the carrying trade now on in the wake of the great war. By this provision the President was directed to give notice to nations with which we have treaties of our desire to abrogate such parts of these treaties as prohibit the imposition of discriminating duties to favor goods carried in American ships.

For many years our policy has been to make no discrimination between goods carried in American or foreign ships. But it was not always so. In the middle decades of the last century our practice was to favor our own ships, and this no doubt was one of the reasons why in that period the American shipping interest reached its highest development. In the tariff bill of 1915 Mr. Underwood, then chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means and more recently a senator, wrote into the law provisions restoring our right to impose discriminatory duties. The Supreme Court ruled that this law could not apply to vessels of nations with which we had treaties prohibiting discriminatory duties. Accordingly in framing the Jones Shipping Act Congress sought to get rid of the restraining treaty provisions. The President was directed to notify the nations interested of our desire to abrogate such sections of our treaties with them as now impose restrictions upon American policy. Congress went into the matter thoroughly and came to its decision deliberately. The President approved the bill, which had long been under consideration, not only in congressional proceedings, but in the newspapers of the country generally.

Now, in taking it upon himself to nullify an act of Congress, the President deals in a wealth of fine phrases regarding the sanctity of treaty obligations, etc. Upon this principle he assumes to justify a point-blank refusal to obey a law given him by Congress and in regular order officially approved by his own hand. Furthermore, the President now declines to do what he did some four years ago. Apparently he has forgotten that his approval, and subsequent action under his authority, made effective the La Follette Seamen's Act, which in identical language directed him to abrogate the provisions of certain treaties. What he did four years ago at the dictation of Sam Gompers he now declines to do. His first plea in justification is that Congress has no authority to direct him to abrogate a treaty. The second is that while the Jones Act requires him to give notice of intent to abrogate, the treaties contain no provision for the giving of such notice and specify no particular time. In the first of these objections there is a measure of technical justification. The exact authority of Congress in the premises has never been authoritatively determined. It is a historical fact that President Hayes vetoed an act of Congress that required him to abrogate certain treaties and that the veto was sustained. Against this stands the fact that in the case of the La Follette Act Mr. Wilson himself accepted the dictation of Congress and that other Presidents have similarly followed the law as laid down for them by Congress.

Very obviously there has come a situation in which the point raised by the President calls for authoritative determination. Has Congress the right to direct the executive department to modify a treaty in such manner as to conform to its own determination of American policy? Has the President the right to nullify by his own authority a law duly made, enacted, and established in the statutory system of the country by act of Congress and by executive approval? These questions press for authoritative answer.

Apart from other aspects of this executive nullification of an established law, it is pleaded by the executive group at Washington in immediate justification of Mr. Wilson's course that in disregarding the Jones law he has saved the country the "miseries of a commercial war." This is so vague as to be meaningless. There is nothing very "miserable" in a commercial war—nothing more serious than business competition. The maritime countries of the world are just now devoting every possible energy to establish themselves in what is colloquially styled the sea-carrying game. It is an open field in which the rights of one country are as good as another. England, Japan, and Norway are going to beat us off the seas if they can; and they have the advantage in a freedom denied to American shipping interests by restrictive laws like that dictated by Andrew Furuseth and bearing the name of Senator La Follette. Assuredly we shall be beaten in the competition if American shipping must bear the double burden of labor dictation and of autocratic executive restriction.

Cheap Tactics.

Twenty-five years ago, during a campaign for "Home Development" in Marion, Ohio, Mr. Harding subscribed for two shares of stock in a local brewery enterprise. After a brief time the brewery failed and all that Mr. Harding got for his investment was the sense of having contributed in a small way to a home boosting programme.

Upon the basis of this transaction Governor Cox in a public address has spoken of Mr. Harding as a "brewer." Mr. Harding is not a brewer. He never was a brewer. Governor Cox knew when he called him a brewer that he was saying what was not true. His purpose in this statement was to put upon Mr. Harding a term of reproach, and it was done with intent to make prejudice against him.

Mr. Harding is not likely to suffer seriously from this incident. Its reflection is not so much upon him as upon Governor Cox. What is to be thought of a candidate for the great office of President of the United States whose bent of mind is so trivial and cheap, whose sense of propriety and dignity is so dull as to permit him to deal in misleading personal reflections upon his rival, to the neglect of the many important interests now before the country?

Editorial Notes.

Mr. Asquith would give Ireland a "full dominion government," relatively like that of Canada, the Australias, New Zealand, and South Africa. This sounds reasonable—and simple—enough. But it will not satisfy Ireland. And nobody—least of all the Irish—knows what will satisfy Ireland. Catholic Ireland wants to rule—and tax—Protestant Ireland. Protestant Ireland will have none of it and will fight to protect itself. Full dominion government for Ireland, as proposed by Mr. Asquith, would surely bring upon Ireland the woes of civil war. It would seem a simple solution of the problem to draw a line between Catholic and Protestant Ireland precisely as we do in state and territorial jurisdictions in this country. The difficulty apparently lies in the fact that geographical division would not separate the mixed elements of Irish life, there being a considerable minority element of Protestants in Catholic Ireland and a large group of Catholics in the Protestant counties.

The northern counties constituting Protestant Ireland are not without justification in the fear that a self-governing Ireland, including the whole island in its jurisdiction, may involve them in conditions approximating persecution. As a minority they would be helpless as against elements traditionally hostile to them and with the peculiarly embittered hostility which always exists wherever religion is the issue. Every student of Irish history can understand the fear that prevails in the northern counties and will sympathize with the demand for guarantees so established by time and precedent as to afford assurance more definite than anything expressed in paper engagements.

The administration of the San Francisco Palace of Fine Arts has arranged for an exhibition of unusual interest, regarded both artistically and educationally. It will include something over a hundred pictures covering every important school of painting in Europe, including the Byzantine, from the fourteenth century down to and including the eighteenth-century French and English schools. Each of the units is representative of an artist of note, including the great masters of Italian, Spanish, Flemish, Dutch, German, English, and French schools. In another column there may be found lists in detail of this very notable exhibit. Such a collection of rare works has never before been placed on view in this country excepting in New York. The total insurance valuation of the collection is placed at ten millions of dollars and several of the pictures are individually valued above a hundred thousand dollars.

although in the sense that they could not be replaced they may be regarded as priceless. The exhibition is made possible by a local committee of art patrons who have guaranteed the very considerable expense in bringing the collection from New York to San Francisco.

The public memory is traditionally short, but hardly so short as to have forgotten the very notable case of Bill Haywood and ninety-three other I. W. W. agitators who were found guilty of obstructing the draft law during the war and sentenced to varying periods of imprisonment in the national penitentiary at Leavenworth. In all but three of these convictions there was appeal to a higher court, which at Chicago on Tuesday of this week rendered judgment in confirmation of the convictions. There was never any moral doubt about the guilt of the accused men. Their activities were open, flagrant, grossly treasonable. In conviction in the United States district court at Chicago they got what they deserved and in the confirmation at the hands of the appellate court the processes of justice are sustained. It is of interest that evidence essential to conviction was to a large extent secured in San Francisco by the detachment of naval officers under Commander Van Antwerp that conducted here during the period of our participation in the war a brilliant service of espionage. Attorneys for the convicted men announce that they will ask for a rehearing, not upon allegations of innocence, but upon grounds that incriminating documents seized by the government were "erroneously admitted as evidence." Upon this slender technical thread the culprits hope ultimately to escape their just deserts. That this appeal may fail is the profound hope of all who have knowledge of the case.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

The German Treaty.

SAN FRANCISCO, September 30, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: When the representatives of the Allied and Associated powers sat down in Paris to the task of making a treaty of peace with Germany they faced a problem complex because of its ramifications and the wide diversity of interests that had to be satisfied, but one that could have been greatly simplified had they but applied common sense to its solution.

Their problem was what to do with the 68,000,000 people that lay prostrate and in their power? These people could not be exterminated and they must live. The day for punishment for either material or physical destruction had passed and in reparation alone was left any offset for the overflowing measure of evil and loss that Germany had brought to the world.

This problem should still further have simplified itself, for no matter what the sum total of the loss caused by Germany there was a distinct and measurable limit to what Germany could pay. To exact greater than this limit would be to destroy Germany as an economic force in Europe. So nice has become the inter-nation adjustment in trade and the supplying of the wants of one country from the surplus of another, or vice versa, that to destroy economic Germany meant the destruction of civilization in Europe.

Keynes in "The Economic Consequence of the Peace" has placed the extreme figure that Germany could possibly pay at $10,000,000 to $15,000,000, and these figures have never been disputed. Fifteen billions is 20 per cent. of the greatest national wealth ($75,000,000,000) that Germany has ever been credited with when she was in undisputed possession of everything that Germany has ever been seized and possessed of. This was the limitation and this is what the Big Four as they were called—Lloyd George, Clemenceau, the representative of Italy, and Woodrow Wilson, "acting in his own name and by his own proper authority"—did and by so doing gave to the world a treaty of peace in name only; one that can not be enforced and one that constantly increases instead of diminishes the unrest that has followed the war.

They first divided up every colony and overseas possession Germany had. They sliced away parts of East Prussia and Silesia, Alsace and Lorraine, the province of Schleswig, the Saar Basin with its coal deposits, the Kreise of Eupen and Malmédy, the territory of Moersnet, Memel on the Baltic, and the city of Danzig. They took all cables and all overseas business and banking connections. They took 108 war craft, 50 per cent. of all ships of over 1600 tons, and 25 per cent. of all ships of less tonnage. They took 20 per cent. of her river craft. They took every aircraft she had save 100 seaplanes and 100 extra engines. They crippled her land transportation by taking a mighty total of cars, engines, motor-cars, and the like, and over 300,000 farm animals as well. They obligated her to build 200,000 tons in ships a year if the Allies wanted them, which was almost 50 per cent. of the total capacity of the shipyards to produce, and they obligated her to deliver within ten years 350,000,000 tons of her greatly diminished output in coal. They further obligated her to deliver in bulk supplies of dyes, henzol, etc. They retarded her with countless trade regulations and "most favored nation" clauses.

Having done all these things and a lot more besides, they authorized the Reparation Commission to compel Germany to deliver 100,000,000,000 marks in gold-bearing bonds ultimately to carry 5 per cent. interest, and if Germany had anything left they authorized that "further issues by way of acknowledgment and security may be required as the commission subsequently determines from time to time." Germany deserved punishment, and the uttermost farthing should have been exacted from her that she could pay and still retain an economic existence. She rode for her fall, got it, and deserved it. This is no plea in her behalf, nor can any American ever hold a brief for Germany.

This is a protest against an act of folly that has dangerously increased the dangerous unrest in the world and that has increased and kept open instead of healing the wounds of the war. This is a protest against the name of the United States having been put to a treaty that not only has proved impossible of enforcement, but which our representatives knew was impossible of enforcement when they signed it at Versailles.

It was an act of international bad faith, which has reacted and will continue to react on our credit and prestige. A Democratic President committed the United States to it as far as it lay in his power to commit and the Democratic party has accepted it in its every implication.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

THE NAME "CALIFORNIA."

Probably the Invention of a Spanish Romancer in the Year 1521.

We have one of the periodical revivals of speculation as to the origin of the name of our state. The first known use of the name California was in a Spanish romance published in 1521. This discovery was made as long ago as 1862 by the late Edward Everett Hale, who presented the text containing the name California to the American Antiquarian Society. California—that is, the peninsula that bears the name of Lower California, was discovered in 1534, some thirteen years after the publication of the romance above referred to. Many theories have been advanced, but none has the support of positive authority. But in all human likelihood the name California had its origin in the brain of a Spanish romancer.

So far as we can learn, no copy of the Spanish story exists in California. The book is entitled "The Exploits of the Very Valiant Knight Esplandian, Son of the Excellent King Amadis of Gaul—In Madrid, 1521." Following is a literal translation of Chapter CLVII, made by the later Camillo Martin 1865 and preserved in the collection of papers of Mr. Thomas J. Barbour of this city:

THE EXPLOITS OF THE VERY VALIANT KNIGHT ESPLANDIAN, SON OF THE EXCELLENT KING AMADIS OF GAUL. (MADRID, 1521.)

CHAPTER CLVII.

The marvelous and not thought of success with which the Queen Calafia came to the Port of Constantinople in favor of the Turks.

I wish you now to know a thing the most strange which ever either in writing or in people's memory could be found, by which the city was the following day on the point of being lost, and how from there where the danger came, salvation came to it.

Know then that to the right hand of the Indies, there was an island called California, very near the part of the terrestrial Paradise, and which was inhabited by black women, without there being among them even one man, that their style of living was almost like that of the Amazons.

They were of robust bodies and valiant and ardent hearts and of great strength; the island itself was the strongest that could be found in the world through its steep and wild rocks; their arms were all of gold and also the harness of the wild beasts on which they rode after taming them, as there was no other metal in the whole island; they dwelled in well-finished caves; they had many ships in which they went to other parts to obtain booty, and the men whom they made prisoners they took along, killing them in the way you shall hear later on.

And sometimes, when they were at peace with their adversaries, they used to mingle with them with entire confidence; if any of them gave birth to a son, he was put to death at once. The reason for it, as it was known, was because in their thought they were resolved to lessen the men to so small a number that they would be able to master them without much trouble, with all their lands, and preserve those who understand that it was convenient to do so that the race might not perish.

In this island, called California, there were many griffins, the likes of a sort of the griffins of the East, and the very sharpest wild beasts therein contained, were not found in any other part of the world; and when they had little ones, these women would go covered with skins to catch them by tricks, and they would bring them to their caves and there rear them; and when they were accustomed to them they would feed them with those men and with the male children they bore so often and with such cunning that they very well learned to know them, and never did them any harm. Any man who landed on the island was at once killed and eaten by them; and though they might be gluttons, they would not the less take them and lift them up, flying through the air, and when tired of carrying them, they would let them fall, where they would be killed at once. Well, at the time when those great men of the ages departed with their large fleets, as history has already told you, there reigned in said Island California a Queen very tall of stature, very handsome for one of them, of blooming age, desiring in her thoughts to do great deeds, valiant in spirit, and in cunning in her fearless heart, more so than any of the others that before her reigned in that seigniory. And having heard how the greatest part of the world was moving in that expedition against the Christians, she, not knowing what things were the Christians, nor having any knowledge of other countries except those which were next to hers, wishing to see the world and its different races, thinking that with her great valor and that of her adherents all that would be gained she would have, by force or cunning, the largest share of, she spoke with all those that were skillful in war, telling them that it would be well that, going in their great fleets they should follow the same road that those great princes and eminent men were taking, inciting and encouraging them by laying before them the very great honor and gain that might result to them from that undertaking; above all, the great fame that would resound in the whole world about them; that remaining in the island as they were doing nothing but what their ancestors had done, would be only to be buried in life, like living dead, passing their days without fame and without glory, like wild animals.

So many things said to them by that very valiant Queen Calafia, that she not only moved her people to consent to the undertaking, but they, with their great desire that their fame should be published in many parts, hurried her to put to sea at once, so as to happen to him in the danger jointly with those great men. The Queen, who saw the determination of her people, ordered her great fleet to be supplied with provisions, and with arms all of gold and with all other necessities; and she ordered the repairing of her largest vessel, made like a grate of thick timbers, and she had put into her up to five hundred griffins, which, as you have been told, she had raised from tender and fed with the flesh of men, and having therein also put the animals on which they rode, and which were of different kinds; also, the best chosen and best armed women which were in the fleet, and leaving such garrison in the island as to be secure, she put to sea with the others, and she hurried so much that she joined the fleets in the night of the combat, of which you have been told, which caused them all very great pleasure, and then she was visited by the great lords, who showed her great reverence.

She wanted to know in what state was their enterprise; begging them to relate it to her minutely; and having heard the report from them, she said "You have fought this city with your many people and could not take it; well, I with mine, if it is agreeable to you, will, on the following day, try the reach of my power, if you will accept my advice." All those great lords answered her, that whatever was by her indicated, they would order it executed. "Then, notify at once all the commanders that tomorrow on no account, and you shall see a fight the most strange never seen before this day, and of which you have never heard spoken." This was then made known to the great Sultan of Liquia and the Sultan of Halapa, who had charge of all the armies which were on land, and who thus ordered their people, wondering much what could be the thought and deed of that Queen.

Electric locomotives descending the Rocky Mountain slopes are able to generate power instead of using it, which assists other trains to climb grades. The power generated by "coasting" is thrown back into the central power stations of the road.

LLOYD GEORGE AND THE RUSSIANS.

Our daily newspapers seem to have decided that we have no longer any interest in European affairs. Vainly we search their columns to discover what is happening in Russia, whether Italy has gone Bolshevik, the tenor of Mr. Lloyd George's latest policy, the progress of the negotiations between Reds and Poles or the gravity of the breach between France and England. Some news potentate seems once more to have waved his wand and to have ordained silence. It is true that the silence has been partially broken in the case of Russia. Some unnamed person has sent a bulletin from some unidentified place to the effect that there have been riots, a news item that it is by no means difficult to believe, seeing that Russia has been one vast riot for a couple of years or more. But at once there has been a renewal of the certainties that Bolshevik Russia is on its last legs, or dying in the last ditch, or whatever it is that Bolshevik Russia is supposed to do every couple of months or so. Our credulities are insatiable, inexhaustible. We are as ready as ever to dance to any tune borne to us upon any breeze, to accept as the law and the gospel whatever dribbles of information or misinformation that are allowed to reach us through the sieve of the censorship. But it is curious, to say the least of it, that we are so amply notified of the apocryphal end of Bolshevism in Russia, while we are kept in Egyptian darkness as to the actual beginnings of Bolshevism in Italy.

A distinguished lawyer said once that the truth can not be wholly suppressed even in an affidavit. Similarly we may say that the news can not be wholly suppressed even by the newspapers. Something like a composite picture may be pieced together by careful collation and arrangement. But the internal situation of Russia remains conjectural. This being the only country from which no news whatever is allowed to come, it is naturally the only country of which our newspapers tell us anything at all. But we may readily believe that the situation there is chaotic. How could it be otherwise? All Bolshevism is chaotic. That is what Bolshevism is. Russia must be starving, seeing that she is still blockaded by warships in the north and by armies in the south. That the maddened people will presently overthrow Bolshevism goes without saying. Maddened peoples will overthrow anything and everything. Mirabeau and the constitutionalists were overthrown by the Girondists in the French Revolution. The Girondists were overthrown by the Terrorists, and the Terrorists were overthrown by Napoleon. An Amurath an Amurath succeeds. Those who are beaten with whips are presently beaten with scorpions, which is only an earlier version of the frying-pan and the fire. But there need be no conjecture about the salient events outside of Russia. These may be ascertained by diligent search and in spite of all the efforts of our newspapers to evade them. None the less Russia remains in the centre of the field. Nothing is done anywhere in Europe except with an eye to Russia. Russia is the pillar of cloud-by day, vast, impenetrable, sinister, alike dreadful and inconceivable.

We will look for a moment at Great Britain, that is to say at Great Britain and Russia, for one must always bracket the name of Russia with that of all other countries. Lloyd George was prepared to recognize Russia a month or so ago, and this was the cause of the split with France. Great Britain wanted to trade with Russia, and France wanted to collect her debt from Russia. Hence these rival tears. But Lloyd George was led to reconsider his contemplated amities, and he had various reasons for this change of front. In the first place he found that Lenin had deliberately deceived him in the matter of the demands upon Poland by suppressing the most vital of those demands, the creation of an army of workmen. Then came the defeat of the Russian armies by the Poles, which naturally lowered the value of the Russian stock. But there was something more important still. The British secret service discovered that the Daily Herald, a labor organ, had received from Lenin the sum of $375,000, ostensibly in order to pay a paper bill, but actually as a Red subvention. Now the Russian government had solemnly pledged itself to interfere in no way whatever with British domestic affairs, and this pledge was to be the basis for the impending negotiations with a view to recognition. It had been impudently broken. Lenin had not only subsidized a British newspaper, but he was known to be in communication with British Reds. There were two Russian commissioners in England at the time, Kameneff and Krassin. Krassin was the first to arrive, and it was his peculiar mission to arrange for the resumption of trade. But it was found at once that there could be no resumption of trade while the two countries were practically in a state of war. Great Britain was maintaining her blockade of Russia, and Russia was doing all she could to annoy Great Britain in Asia Minor and India. Obviously there had to be some general political understanding before there could be a trade relationship, and so Kameneff was sent as Russia's political emissary. Then came the revelations with regard to the Herald and the additional fact that Kameneff was hand in glove with the labor leaders, who are nearly all of them Direct Action men. Lloyd George at once took the bull by the horns, or rather the bear by the tail, and ordered Kameneff to leave the country. He said that Krassin might remain and that the trade negotiations might continue. In vain it was pleaded that Kameneff knew nothing about the Herald subsidy and that he was equally innocent in the matter of the Polish treaty treachery. Indeed, such a plea had no force. He was responsible as the representative of the Russian government and he had to go. There the matter now rests, and an arrangement, either commercial or political, seems as far off as ever. Lloyd George is accused of enmity toward the Labor party and of an effort to consolidate himself with conservative and anti-Russian elements in view of the general election. France triumphantly says "I told you so," and our own government seems to be emphatic in its applause of Lloyd George's attitude in this turning the sword in a wound that now seems to be incurable. Doubtless there are those in America, as there are certainly those in England, who will deeply deplore the rejection of what they are pleased to call the Russian olive branch. But it is hard to see what other course the British premier could have taken. How could there be negotiations with those who had thus repeatedly proved themselves to be incurably false and who thus openly derided their own pledges? Such negotiations could be no more than writings on the sand.

The details of the Red subvention to the Herald are of considerable interest in this country, because there can be very little doubt that similar payments have been offered or made in America, and by the same means, the sale of Russian jewelry. It may be said that the Herald met the publication of the facts with a sharp denial. It knew nothing of them. It had received nothing from Russia. The whole thing was a fabrication designed to hurt the cause of labor, another page of misrepresentation and slander of the proletariat cause. Then the government furnished its proofs. It is an awkward way that governments have. One may infer from the documents published that Lenin did not offer the money to the Herald. It was the Herald that asked for it. The cost of paper had become prohibitive. It was necessary either to secure financial aid from Russia or to double the subscription price. Moreover, if no aid were given the Herald would cease to be a Red and would become constitutionalist. Lenin then sent the jewels to London and they were sold, the proceeds being handed over to the Herald. Now it would seem either that the Herald was unaware of the extent of the government's information or that its reply had been made under the influence of panic. For it began at once to sidestep, to explain, and to palliate. Finally it published a statement to the effect that when Meynell was in Russia he had discussed the situation of the Herald with Russian representatives, but that he did so on his own initiative. He had explained to the Russians that the money would have to be a free and unconditional gift and without any ensuing obligations on the part of the Herald. These conditions were agreed to by the Russians, "and Meynell thereupon took steps—necessarily very slow and spread over several months—to collect the money then agreed upon, namely, £75,000. This was to be held in trust for the Third International and to be offered to the Daily Herald if the need arose. This sum is now in Meynell's possession, and we wish to have the opinion of our readers as to whether we should accept it." The Herald statement concludes with the assertion that "the ever-increasing cost of production, and the political shyness of advertisers despite our 370,000 circulation, make it necessary for us at once to double the price of the paper without this help." It will be seen that this statement is a full confession of the charges, since no one but an idiot will believe that the Herald was unaware of negotiations thus conducted in its interests, and of the actual payment to Meynell of the money which it now asks the permission of its readers to accept. This statement, be it remembered, followed the blank and unqualified denial of the Herald that there had been any such transaction or thought of it.

Immediately after the publication of this statement there was an interview between Lloyd George and Kameneff. Lloyd George blankly charged Kameneff with (1) participation in the realization of Russian jewels in England; (2) subsidizing the Herald; (3) having relations with the Direct Action labor men; (4) incorrect transmission of the Russian conditions for the armistice with Poland. Kameneff denied the first three charges, while he explained the suppression of the demand upon Poland for the creation of a workers' army on the ground that he himself was opposed to such an army and expected that the demand would be withdrawn. Lloyd George refused to accept either the denials or the explanations and notified Kameneff that he must leave the country. He was also told that certain associates of Kameneff then on their way to England would not be allowed to land. Moreover, Lloyd George published a statement of which the Manchester Guardian furnishes the following summary:

"(1) The government has evidence that Mr. Kameneff informed his government that £40,000 worth of jewels had been sold and the proceeds paid over to the Daily Herald, and that he was taking steps to procure a further £60,000, of which an additional £10,000 was to be paid to the Daily Herald. (2) The government flatly contradicts Mr. Kameneff's denial that he had ever given or offered a subsidy to the Daily Herald, and the Daily Herald's statement that it had received 'not a bond, not a franc, not a rouble.' In the sale in London of diamonds brought by the Russian delegation great care was taken that the transaction should not pass through any bank account, but that bank notes should be paid. When the Daily Herald stated on September 10th that not gold but an offer of gold had been received by Mr. Francis Meynell, a director of the Daily Herald, who was stated to have acted absolutely on his own initiative, Mr. Edgar Lansbury, son of the editor of the paper, had in fact received part of the notes given for the jewels. The Daily Herald asked its readers on September 10th, 'Shall we take £75,000 Russian money because Mr. Edgar Lansbury had been interviewed by the police about the notes just before.' The government permits itself to doubt whether the Herald would have taken the public into its confidence but that the secret could no longer be kept. (3) Mr. Kameneff in effect did deliberately alter the terms of the despatch from his government giving the fundamental conditions of the armistice to be proposed to Poland. (4) The government feels it necessary to publish these facts because the evidence of Mr. Kameneff's violation of his pledge to abstain from propaganda in this country is overwhelming and his published apology misleading." The situation between Great Britain and Russia is therefore worse than it was before.

A Canadian Boat Song.

Faintly as tolls the evening chime,
Our voices keep tune and our oars keep time.
Soon as the woods on the shore look dim,
We'll sing at St. Ann's our parting hymn.
Row, brothers, row, the stream runs fast,
The Rapids are near and the daylight's past.

Why should we yet our sail unfurl?
There is not a breath the blue wave to curl;
But, when the wind blows off the shore,
Oh! sweetly we'll rest our weary oar.
Blow, breezes, blow, the stream runs fast,
The Rapids are near and the daylight's past.

Utawas' tide! this trembling moon
Shall see us float over thy surges soon.
Saint of this green isle, hear our prayers,
Oh, grant us cool heavens and favoring airs.
Blow, breezes, blow, the stream runs fast,
The Rapids are near and the daylight's past.

Home, Sweet Home.

Mid pleasures and palaces though we may roam,
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home.
A charm from the skies seems to hallow us there,
Which, seek through the world, is ne'er met with elsewhere.
Home! home! sweet, sweet home!
There's no place like home!
There's no place like home!

An exile from home, splendor dazzles in vain:
Oh! give me my lowly thatched cottage again.
The birds singing gayly, that come at my call,—
Give me them, with the peace of mind dearer than all.
Home! home! sweet, sweet home!
There's no place like home!
There's no place like home!

How sweet 'tis to sit 'neath a fond father's smile,
And the cares of a mother to soothe and beguile!
Let others delight 'mid new pleasures to roam,
But give, oh! give me the pleasures of home.
Home! home! sweet, sweet home!
But give me, oh! give me,
The pleasures of home.

To thee I'll return, overhurdled with care:
The heart's dearest solace will smile on me there.
No more from that cottage again will I roam:
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home.
Home! home! sweet, sweet home!
There's no place like home!
There's no place like home!

Woodman Spare That Tree.

Woodman, spare that tree—touch not a single hough!
In youth it sheltered me, and I'll protect it now.
'Twas my forefather's hand that placed it near his cot;
There, woodman, let it stand—thy ax shall harm it not!

That old familiar tree, whose glory and renown
Are spread o'er land and sea—and wouldst thou hack it down?
Woodman, forbear thy stroke—cut not its earth-bound ties;
O, spare that aged oak, now towering to the skies!

When but an idle boy, I sought its grateful shade;
In all their gushing joy, here, too, my sisters played.
My mother kissed me here; my father pressed my hand;
Forgive this foolish tear, but let that old oak stand!

My heartstrings round thee cling, close as thy hark, old friend!
Here shall the wild bird sing, and still thy branches bend.
Old tree, the storm still brave! And, woodman, leave the spot;

While I've a hand to save, thy ax shall harm it not!

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Frederick Harrison, English journalist and philosopher, is close to his ninetieth year, yet his handwriting is firmer than that of many a man of half his age, and he still contributes trenchant articles to reviews and magazines.

Lorena Trickey, winner of the cowgirls' relay championship race at the annual Cheyenne, Wyoming, frontier days round-up, changed horses and saddles at every half-mile during the race and won from many competitors. She is conceded to be the champion all-around woman rider.

George Bernard Shaw has been in Ireland all summer. Also the playwright has never visited the United States of America. Perhaps that is the cause for his cabled message to the Theatre Guild forbidding the world premiere of his play, "Heartbreak House," until after the presidential election.

Charles Henry Goodson, veteran of Balaklava, the siege of Lucknow, and four years in General Robert E. Lee's command, formerly wealthy, has applied for permission to sell papers on the streets of Chicago. Goodson, as a British surgeon in the Crimea, had as one of his nurses Florence Nightingale. He is ninety-five years old.

Amelita Galli-Curci, the famous coloratura soprano, upon returning from Italy on the Imperator, announced that she is to become an American citizen. She returned to America two months earlier than usual this year, because she says that she likes America so much better than Europe. She said that she was through with the Old World for all time.

Fred A. Howard, chemist and scientist of South Easton, Massachusetts, for almost a half-century connected with research work for the shoe and leather trade, solving problems and settling troubles of the manufacturers of shoes, gloves, and belts, has made discoveries that may cut the bills of the nation for footwear. His latest discovery, a solution called "Kerite," is said to have doubled the wearing life of leather by actual tests.

George H. White, Cox's campaign manager, is described as rawboned and rangy. His eyes are bluish gray. He wears low collars, which give full play to a pronounced Adam's apple, and he has a heavy beard which he has to shave off morning and evening if it is not to be noticeable. His friends joke about his "Alaska whiskers." In talking with White it is easy to gather the impression that he is a rough-and-tumble sort of a person, ready for a fight at the drop of the hat. Sitting down he slides clear into a chair, resting himself more on the middle of his back, entwining his long legs around each other and swinging one of them with an even rhythm. Even then he's ready to jump up at the slightest excuse, ready for action. Born in Elmira, New York, reared at Titusville, Pennsylvania, educated at Princeton, New Jersey, residing at Marietta, Ohio, White's chief business interests are in Oklahoma. He's in the oil business, drilling his own wells. Sometimes he strikes oil; sometimes he does not—but, on the whole, he makes it pay.

General Baron Peter Wrangel is a young man—only thirty-nine. An official report received at Washington states that he is of German descent, but that his immediate ancestors came from the Baltic provinces. He began his career in the Russian army in 1901, enlisting in the Norse Guards Regiment as a private after having been educated as a mining engineer. He left the army a year later, following promotion to a lieutenantancy, but reënlisted upon the outbreak of the Russo-Japanese war, in which he was twice promoted for bravery. Subsequently he was graduated from the General Staff Academy and at the outbreak of the world war was captain in command of a cavalry squadron. For distinguished service with this command he was decorated with the highest Russian military order—the Cross of St. George. Promotion to the rank of colonel followed; he was appointed an aide to the Czar and later became commander of the First Trans-Baikal Cossack Regiment, with which, in July, 1916, he captured an entire battalion. He was then made major-general.

Mme. de Witt Schlumberger is president of the French Union for Women Suffrage and first vice-president of the International Woman Suffrage Alliance. She speaks English fluently and represents all that is finest in French family, intellectual, and political life. She also has a keen sense of humor, which helps her out considerably in her battle for women's votes in France. Mme. de Witt Schlumberger is the granddaughter of a prime minister under Louis Philippe and has an estate in Normandy. She married a member of an old Alsatian family years ago, for Mme. Schlumberger is now white-haired and near seventy. They had five sons and one daughter. After 1870, when Alsace became a part of Germany, every young man had to do his military training in the German army or leave Alsace never to return. The Schlumberger sons chose the latter, turning their backs on the assured positions in their father's important industries. When the fifth son came of age the family determined they could stand the separation no longer, so they gave up their place in Alsace and established themselves in Paris.

THE CALL OF THE SURF.

Mr. Van Campen Heilner and Mr. Frank Stick Describe Some Adventures on the Shore.

Many and many a book has been written on the glories of lake and river fishing and the somewhat sterner delights offered by the ocean and its denizens. But little or nothing has been said about the specialized art of the surf fisher. Here is a sport that can be followed all the year round, that needs no boat, and that contains a greater element of chance than any other form of fishing. One casts a fly and he catches trout, and only trout. To hunt the bass is usually to catch the bass, and nothing else. But one never knows what one may draw from the surf. It may be some dainty opalescent creature, and it may be a shark weighing a thousand pounds. No other fishing is likely to bring such tremendous results, to make such fierce demands upon nerve and muscles. No wonder that it should so increase in popularity as its virtues become known.

Mr. Van Campen Heilner and Mr. Frank Stick tell us about it in their new book, "The Call of the Surf." They fished for sea monsters on the Eastern coast and then they came to California to try their luck in warmer waters, and they were not disappointed. They write of their experiences with such gusto and delight as to send us all hurrying to the shore to try our luck in one of the hardest pursuits that can fall to the sportsman.

The gull is a fairly safe guide to the fishing grounds. He, too, is a fisherman of repute and should be regarded as a comrade. The author tells us of one occasion in southern Jersey when he was attracted by the circling of gulls, although he could see nothing in the green waters to justify their clamor:

My rod was equipped with a Belmar squid, so I wasted no time in meditation over what manner of fish had attracted my brother fishermen, the gulls, but made my cast, working the lure rapidly shoreward. No strike rewarded my efforts, and so again I cast, and yet again without result. And still the gulls darted, swooped, and clamored, as though encouraging me to further efforts. On my eighth or tenth cast I varied my system, and on the chance that the fish, whatever they were, might be cutting into the bait from below, I allowed the squid to sink, and brought it to me with long, jerky movements. Scarce had I taken a dozen turns when there came a mighty strike which swept the tip of my rod downward, the reel handle striking my knuckle a sound crack as it was jerked from my grasp. Out and out my line swept, while with every nerve atingle I pressed hard on the leather drag and braced back against the rod. A hundred, two hundred, three hundred feet of line the fish took ere he halted his rush, and swam parallel to the beach. I felt sure that another heside a blue, or else a monster specimen of this hard-fighting species had fastened to my squid, and I played him carefully. Fifteen or twenty minutes of hattle he gave me ere I had him close inshore, and then as he lifted into a curling breaker, with the sun shining greenly through, I made him out. A good striped bass he was, and long before I had succeeded in coaxing him into a wave which laid him gently at my feet I had raised such a to-do that my two friends, aroused at last from their slumbers, joined me, a bit shy as to clothing, but fully equipped with rods and tackle.

Five bass, ranging up to eighteen pounds in weight, we took from this school in the space of an hour, and then the fish moved onward, and the gulls with them, and we returned to camp for a belated though doubly relished breakfast.

On another occasion the author tells us of hooking and losing a shark, and incidentally it may be said that the shark is by no means bad eating. Hearing a shout from his nearest neighbor, he hurried to his aid and found him bent double with both hands clenched around a violently jerking rod:

"Bass?" I inquired, excitedly, when I had reached him. "Feels that way," he answered, jerkily. "Either bass or submarine. He took it on the jump just before I yelled, and most of my line is gone already. He must be a whopper."

Just then he uttered a disappointed, "damn!" and I saw his rod straighten and the line go limp. Dejectedly he reeled in, while I uttered commiserations, for at such times as these the world carries a dark and gloomy aspect to your fisherman.

"I don't know how it happened," he complained, as he guided the line upon the reel. "I gave him no slack, that's certain. The hook must have pulled loose."

The last remaining few feet of line came in, and the mystery was explained, to me at least, for we found the entire rig cleanly severed from the line.

"Probably a shark," I hazarded. "How did he bite?" "He didn't bite at all," my friend replied. "He just grabbed the bait and left like the proverbial bat. I thought at the time it was an almighty hard strike for a channel bass, but I was counting on bass, and shark didn't occur to me."

"I believe I'll tie on about six feet of wire, anyway," I said. "If it was a shark there are probably more of 'em about, and I wouldn't mind a little run in with a man-eater just for exercise. I'm getting a bit chilly without my sweater."

Those who want an ocean fight of the first class are recommended to seek the shark. He is always willing to oblige and there is no thought of surrender in his fierce and evil heart. The author tells us of a long day's fishing, and of his resolve to quit the beach at twenty minutes to 11 on a moonlit night:

This entirely sensible plan was not to be carried out, however, for scarcely had I replaced the watch in my pocket when there came a strike which almost tore the rod from my somewhat lax grasp. I was fully awake on the instant, and I put my weight on the rod in order to set the hook firmly, an action which was scarcely required. There was only one fish in these waters which could give a strike like this, and only one fish, with the exception of the tuna, which could take out line at the rate with which it was disappearing. Like the blow of a sledge he had smashed into the bait and, irresistible as a six-cylinder car, he was tearing out to sea. I put all my weight and strength against the rod, and hore down upon the brake with both thumbs, but this fellow minded it not in the slightest. I have hooked good fish in my time, of a hundred species, but never before nor since have I felt greater power than was in this creature.

There was a thousand feet of twelve-thread line on the reel, but all except about a hundred feet were gone in a few seconds. The fish must be turned at all costs, and this was successfully done by a series of sharp jerks, and done again and again for the next two hours:

Up to this time I had given the fish pretty much his own way, simply putting on the line all the resistance it would bear, and attempting to tire him by his own exertions, which had been almost continuous. Now I started a slow, steady pumping. And then I wished I hadn't, for again he started a rush seaward, as though freshly awake to his predicament. Again he sent the rod swaying and jerking, as he clove through the water in surging plunges, and again I thought I had lost him. But judging at last from my own condition the strain of the contest was beginning to tell, for he turned at last, and headed up the beach, but still hattering for all that was in him. "Lord, what a fighter!" my companion ejaculated. "He must be as big as a horse."

By this time I felt that I had some slight control over my quarry. At least this last run seemed to show that he was losing somewhat in strength, and so I kept him on the go, though myself so tired with the unceasing strain that my movements had become almost automatic. When he tried to sulk, I pumped him, and invariably he would be off again, sometimes on these occasions swimming straight out to sea, at others darting either up or down the beach. I had but two thoughts: one to keep the fish moving until he was exhausted, the other to hold him away from the rip. For once in this sea-hearing current I knew that no power of reel or line could force him to turn.

When 4 o'clock came my companion, after advising me to break the line, on being requested to remove himself to a certain torrid region from whence none returneth, took his departure. And then I was sorry to be left alone, and was almost tempt to heed his advice. Doubtless I would have done so if he had not muttered something about a "damn fool" as he stumbled up the beach. I have always been a perverse and a stubborn individual—to which statement my friends will agree—and so I set my teeth, stifled a groan, and leaning back on the rod, again pumped the fish into action.

It seems almost incredible, but the author tells us that he continued the fight until daybreak. He believed then that the fish was all in, but he knew that he himself was, and so at 6 o'clock he surrendered his rod to a friend and turned in for a badly needed sleep:

The next moment, it seemed, I was awakened by my tent mate hallowing in my ear:

"Get up! Get up and hustle down to the beach, if you want to see them land your fish!"

I forced my sore and unwilling limbs into action, which so it turned out was wholly unnecessary, for the shout which had aroused my companion was only to apprise us that the quarry had broken free. At the end, with practically all of the line exhausted, the tackle had given way just above the wire leader.

This fish had put up a battle without parallel in the records of our surf-fishing clubs, and one which for duration I doubt if any fish has exceeded on light tackle. From a quarter before 11 he had waged a stubborn fight throughout the night, and had made his escape at 7:15 the following morning: eight hours and a half later. The last hour he fought as stubbornly and with almost as much activity as in the beginning. After I had relinquished the rod he had made three long runs, taking out six to eight hundred feet of line each time.

Atlantic blue fishing is by no means without its charms, although it does not seem to come exactly under the head of surf fishing. We are told of a memorable day when the whole surface of the ocean seemed to be swarming with these fish:

The sea on all sides of the boat was swarming with bluefish. Everywhere one looked bluefish were dashing here and there in their mad rushes after the small fish. These were leaping wildly along the surface in vain attempt to elude their pursuers.

Every few moments a big blue would shoot out of water, to fall again with a great splash. The water resembled a maelstrom from the frantic dashes of the fish.

We at once commenced to circle, and so plentiful were the strikes, and so fast and furious the sport, that at the conclusion of twenty minutes I was only too glad to snatch a brief rest from my strenuous labors.

Billy, who was cursing and perspiring at a great rate, kept shouting at me: "Get out, Campen! Get out! There are some wonders in that school!"

"All right, have your way," I grunted, and tossed my squid overboard. Instantly I had a savage strike. Two hundred feet of line were stripped off the reel before out of the water shot a beautiful blue, violently shaking his head from side to side like some bulldog, in a futile attempt to spit out the squid.

Repeatedly coming out of water, always eluding the boat and tearing away on long rushes time and time again when I imagined him beaten, he put up a beautiful fight.

The strain gradually told and in he came, glaring defiantly up at us. Cap lifted him over the side, gasping hot game, and he was flopped unceremoniously into the bilge. He scaled just four ounces shy of nine pounds.

The sportsman will find that the tuna gives him everything that he wants in the way of sport, but the tuna is hated by the market fisherman, who are after the bluefish. The author tells us that on one occasion he made a bargain with the fishermen to signal him as soon as the giant tuna were after their lines, and the signal was presently given and responded to:

The big tuna was there at last! A sight met our eyes I shall never forget to my dying day! Swimming some distance below the surface, and occasionally rising to gulp down whole moss-hunkers which were being tossed to them, were the largest tuna I ever beheld. Their great forked tails, their bronze backs and deep-blue sides, their white bellies as they turned quickly, registered a picture on the photographic plate of my memory which no acid can ever wash away. I saw tuna in that slick ten feet long! Deep down I saw his shadows cruising back and forth that were fish weighing well over a thousand pounds.

I was actually afraid to lower a bait to those fish! I feared the consequences.

"Come, come, old fellow," I seemed to hear Billy saying. "What are we here for?"

I tightened the brakes on my big reel, adjusted my rod belt, put on a big side of mosshunker, and mechanically lowered it into the innocent-looking water. For a short time nothing occurred. I saw fish pass and repass the bait, apparently without noticing it. Then, as if in a dream, I watched a tuna as large as a horse rise swiftly to the bait, seize it, and with several savage jerks of his head, move slowly off. I let him run unhindered for several hundred feet, then threw on the breaks and struck—struck as I never struck before.

As to just what happened in the next few seconds I have never had a clear impression. My rod described such an arc I feared it would instantly crack, my reel commenced gathering momentum . . . faster . . . faster—faster until it was actually screaming with terrific speed. Such a leverage was exerted on my belt that I cried aloud in agony. There was a frightful, hurried moment when the sea and sky seemed rushing through space at a dreadful rate, a report like a pistol shot, and two thousand feet of line snapped at the spool! Trembling and in a cold sweat I fell speechless into the bottom of the boat.

"She damn heeg feesh!" remarked Sam in an awed voice.

The author was so injured by the pressure of the rod that he could fish no more, but one of his companions tried his luck:

Cautiously the bait was lowered. Sam stood by the engine, ready to throw in the clutch the moment Billy gave the signal; the marketmen steadily fed out the hunkers, and I perched myself in the stern, my fingers nervously grasping the tiller.

Then the unexpected happened. A great splashing in the water some distance away caused us all to turn quickly in that direction. A big fin cut sharply through the water for one brief instant, and was gone.

"Shark!" raged Billy. "Farewell, tuna!"

And even as he spoke, below the bait appeared a great wavering shape whose size and weight eclipsed our wildest nightmares.

"A monster man-eater!" I gasped. "Cut your line, quick!"

"No, hy gar!" thundered Sam. "She ban horse mackerel!"

"He's on! Start the boat!" shouted Billy, and off we went.

Hard against the rod he threw his weight, and as the skiff got under way I could hear the reel giving off a sort of moaning hum.

"Faster! Faster! Can't hold him!" he wildly babbled, and as Sam pulled the throttle into the last notch we seemed fairly to leap across the waves.

That tuna headed straight out to sea, and for two long hours we sped after it. The fleet melted into the distance until they were but dark specks on the horizon—then disappeared entirely. A lone gull hovered in our wake for several miles, then it, too, left us. We were afloat on a desert of waves and wind.

Four hours dragged by, and Billy was in bad shape. Despite the fact that he was using the harness, his hands were raw and bleeding, his face pale and ghastly, but with a look of determination on it that spoke far more than words.

During all this time we had been steadily following the fish. And slowly but surely it had been taking line. It did not sound after the general manner of tuna, but acted as if with a purpose, with a determination to reach some definite place.

Sam cast an anxious eye at the sun. It was now 2 o'clock, and we must be thirty or more miles off the beach. He gave me a questioning look, as if to say, "Are you willing to stick?" I nodded in the affirmative, even though I knew it must mean an all-night vigil, with the possible chance of a storm. As a friend of mine once remarked, "The Atlantic is not the Pacific," meaning that while calm seas are the rule in the latter, the former is at all times treacherous, choppy and mean.

At 3 o'clock Billy called me over to him. "I'm . . . afraid . . . I've got . . . to quit . . . old . . . hoy," he said, pitifully. "This . . . is . . . more . . . than . . . I . . . bargained for."

The author tells us that he had often gazed longingly at the miles of surf beating on the Pacific Coast and had pondered on the possibilities offered to the surf angler. Then at last came the opportunity to visit Monterey Bay at a point where the Salinas River joins the Elkhorn Slough. Here is a favorite haunt for striped bass, although the method in vogue is by trolling from a skiff with spoons or still fishing on the bottom with sardine bait. Here in August Mr. McCloud and his father betook themselves to try their luck at the surf-casting game. Doubtful, yet hopeful, they were determined they would not depart before they had thoroughly investigated every foot of those waters. The entry in Mr. McCloud's diary of August 21st, typical of many such entries, says:

The surf fish stopped annoying us after a while and the bass began striking. Inside of a half-hour I beached the first one—seventeen and a half pounds.

Shortly after this my father lost a very heavy fish. We saw it break water, and I judged roughly it was more than forty pounds. This made us very much excited.

I followed with a twenty-pound fish, and after landing it, cast out again, to feel immediately a savage strike. This also was a large fish. He carried me down the beach for several hundred feet and then got off. He broke water twice. I feel sure he was the mate to the one father hooked.

Dad then took an eighteen-pounder. He had considerable difficulty with it, due to the fact that the handle of his reel came loose during the fracas. I had to screw it on. And the bass was heading down the beach all the time. What with father shouting to me to hurry and the bass jerking the tip of the rod violently, things were in a fine mess. My fingers seemed all thumbs, but I finally got the handle on and the fish was soon landed.

Then came a twenty-one-pound fish, followed by one thirteen and a half, and another eighteen and a half. This kept us exceedingly busy.

Father felt tired, so went up in the dunes for a rest. I felt tired, myself, for to tell the truth, my arguments with these silvery warriors of the surf had not left me in as fresh a condition as beforehand. But I continued fishing alone.

About 1 o'clock I had a hard, fast strike. I hooked the fish. It stripped more than three hundred feet of line from the reel before I could check it. Up the beach it ran, skirting the outer bar "with the bit in its teeth." It was a "fightin' fish," quite the most determined one I had yet encountered. For a time things looked dubious. The line continued to run steadily out, despite the fact I had both thumbs hard-pressed against the spool. Then it turned and ran in on me so swiftly that I could not reel fast enough to take up the slack.

I thought I had lost it, but the line suddenly sung taut, and the merry battle was on once more. I got it coming on a great big roller, which slid it almost to my feet. That was the end. I was very tired, but when the bass pulled the scales down to twenty-four pounds I felt considerably better.

Those who want to "go and do likewise" will find in this volume a veritable mine of information, not only about the fish themselves, but on such all-important topics as tackle, camp equipment, and outfit. The illustrations from photographs are exceptionally good.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending October 2, 1920, were $171,800,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $169,300,000; a gain of $2,500,000.

Gold held by the banks in the Twelfth Federal District increased $9,390,000 to $56,037,000 during the last week, according to the weekly report made Saturday by the San Francisco Federal Reserve Bank. Gold reserves of these banks showed an increase of $8,820,000 during the same period, according to the report.

Earning assets of the banks under this division of the Federal District also showed a gain of $15,000 for the week ending October 1st, while bills on hand increased $523,000.

The National Bank of Commerce of New York makes the following statement regarding current market conditions and the credit situation:

"The credit situation has continued, during the period ending September 15th, to evidence in a substantial measure the improvement which had become apparent a month ago. There has not, it is true, been any easing of credit. Banking loans have increased in response to seasonal needs; there has been no relaxation in commercial money rates; and little change in this situation can be expected until the major requirements of the crop-moving season have been met. Nevertheless, substantial progress has been made in overcoming the difficulties in the credit situation.

"Harvesting and marketing of large crops mobility of credits is gradually being restored. Progress is being made in the liquidation of commodity stocks and of loans against them. While the downward trend of prices involves current difficulties, it is a movement toward greater rather than less stability in both the credit and the general business situation, since it tends to reduce the pressure on banking facilities and at the same time to stimulate the large potential demand for goods which increasingly high prices have impaired. In contrast with the movement in progress a year ago, therefore, the general trend of business conditions within the United States is in the direction of increasing soundness and stability.

"Prices continue to move downward in many important groups of raw products, and of semi-manufactured materials for use in further manufactures. Declines have been passed on to the finished product in some lines. Unless untoward social and political developments should take place in Europe, however, it now seems likely that in the case of most commodities the period of rapid price adjustment has passed, and that fluctuations from now on will be through a gradually narrowing margin. Present price movements, however, must be interpreted with the greatest care. Cases in point are those commodities the prices of which appear superficially stable, but in which, as a matter of fact, almost no business is being done. In such cases, actual values can not be known until trading operations are resumed.

"Curtailed of manufacturing and merchandising activities was inevitable while price changes were radical in character. On the other hand, slowly declining prices require that business be carried on cautiously with careful thought to the long future, but do not preclude sane and conservative operations. Unwillingness to face the facts in the hope of a return to another period of rapidly rising prices, and failure to admit that a new working basis must be found, not only react on the individual interests involved, but on the entire business community. Fortunately the facts have been recognized by many interests, but in some lines failure to do so is handicapping business.

"The United States is in a more favorable position than any other country in the world. If a mutual basis for transactions is found in the immediate future, labor will be kept reasonably well employed, and manufacturing, commercial, and financial operations will be maintained at a healthy level. Delay in finding such a mutual basis is not only unwise, but it might well result in entirely unnecessary industrial, financial, and social disorganization.

"The condition now prevailing in the United States of declining prices and of consequent hesitation on the part of the buyer, whether he be manufacturer or ultimate consumer, prevails in every important country of the world. The British textile industries have felt, not only a slackened domestic demand, but the effects of curtailed buying in distant markets, especially India. The hoot, shoe, and leather industries of the United Kingdom are now in a state of stagnation. Extreme dullness in the main commodity markets is reported from Constantinople. Business in South Africa is likewise reported as dull. The Japanese situation is a matter of common knowledge. Ports as widely scattered as the Pireus and Barranquilla are congested with goods bought in large quantities at the flood-tide of post-war prosperity. These goods must now be handled on overburdened railways, in markets disposed to be critical of prices.

"The rest of the world has become accustomed to the absence of the countries of central and of eastern Europe as producers and consumers of manufactured goods, but their continued inability to buy certain classes of raw materials is being increasingly felt.

"If the business hesitation now prevalent in the United States were peculiarly an American condition, a quick return to a condition of activity could be anticipated. An adjustment of international trade, however, will require a long period for its completion. American business must depend primarily on domestic demand, with the expectation of a fluctuating and uncertain foreign demand."

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company is participating in an offer of $40,000,000 Swift & Co. 7 per cent. five-year gold notes. Coupon notes in interchangeable denominations of $1000, $500, and $100. The price is 97½ and interest, to yield over 7.50 per cent. These notes will be the direct obligation of Swift & Co., one of the largest and most successful concerns in the world engaged in the production and sales of meats and their by-products. The notes are followed by $150,000,000 authorized and issued capital stock, upon which dividends at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum are now being paid. The company has paid cash dividends without interruption for the past thirty-five years.

Opinions may differ as to coming general conditions in the business and financial world, but all men agree that adverse influences are continually aggravated and favorable ones largely neutralized by the weight of existing excessive taxation. The present Federal tax system was hurriedly devised by inexperienced and unscientific legislators under the pressure of a great war, and its imperfections are so gross that radical modification of it is a growing necessity. Especially has that feature providing for taxation of excess profits become an intolerable handicap to enterprise and a burden on the consuming public. The unjust workings of excess profit taxes instigate business men to indulge in unnecessary and often wasteful expenditure. They make various outlays that they would get along without were the sums they spent not taken from the amount they would otherwise pay to the government. These taxpayers justify themselves by the too-well-founded suspicion that if they do not use the money the political powers that be may misuse it. Thus by the very harshness of its exactions the government is losing revenue.

Dependence for income on such a varying and uncertain quantity as the profits of business is a poor permanent policy for any government. There should be a more solid and reliable basis on which to levy contributions for its support. The excess profits rolled up in war-time no longer are feasible. Profits are shrinking toward normal as peacetime continues, and before long tribute to the government from this source must become comparatively trifling. It is already imperative to design a substitute stream for this diminishing flow into the treasury's reservoir.

To the consumer the excess profits tax is a far more serious matter than most of us have realized. This tax is invariably added by manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers to the prices of goods produced and distributed. That is, it is pyramided, made cumulative, so that the consumer, so far as he buys, pays the taxes which he fondly supposed fell on maker and dealer. Every man, woman, and child in the United States today feels the evil effects of taxes prolonged far beyond the emergency which alone gave them sanction. One of the most urgent duties of Congress will be the prompt and sensible overhauling of our obnoxious taxation scheme.

But with what shall we replace it? Nothing better so far has been recommended than the levying of a 1 per cent. tax on "the nation's gross sales or turnover, of whatever kind or nature." This plan has been effectively advocated by financiers of standing, like J. S. Bache, Otto Kahn, and many others, and it is urged by the Business Men's National Tax Committee, an influential body. It does not involve doing away with the income tax altogether. The latter, it is planned, will be improved so as to raise the limit of exemption, abolish surtaxes, and institute a graduated income tax lighter than is now the case. Such revision of the income tax would also be an act of justice to many who suffer from present inequalities.

The gross sales tax would, it is estimated, yield $4,000,000,000 to $6,000,000,000 a year, sufficient, with income tax and possible protective tariff proceeds, to meet governmental outlays and leave a margin for the retirement of our war bonds. While the system now in effect is maddeningly complicated and collection of its levies extremely expensive, the gross sales tax would be simple and dues under it should be collectable easily and cheaply. The present plan, it is calculated, increases the cost of products to the consumer not less than 23 per cent. The gross sales tax would also be passed on to the consumer, but, as figured, it would add only about 3 per cent. to the cost of his purchases. Thus it would reduce H. C. L. by about 20 per cent., a material advantage that popular sentiment is likely to demand. The details of the plan should, of course, be carefully worked out by Congress so as to avoid injustices or evasions, but the central idea is rapidly growing in favor.

With our taxation system properly designed, the relief to general business would be immense. Impetus would be given to enterprise throughout the land. Taxable securities now selling low because their holders dumped them in order to procure tax-exempt issues would again become desirable and be sought for. The financial market would show new life, for then more of the profits of investment and speculation would accrue to those who risk their capital on issues of governments and corporations.—Leslie's Weekly.

first time a satisfactory fabric for that purpose.

It has taken twelve years in time and the expenditure of over $800,000 in money, combined with the assistance of many engineers and rubber experts, to develop this product to its present perfection.

Under the construction covered by patents under which the American Tire Corporation is operating, neither tires nor hose are subject to blowouts.

Tires built four years ago have stood usage over three years, and upon being taken off the rim the fabric was found to be as good as when constructed. Tires made of this fabric will stand at least two retreadings.

These tires have run as high as twenty-four thousand miles without retreading. They will, as far as fabric is concerned, outwear any tire made, besides relieving the user of danger from blowouts.

are being financed adequately and without undue strain on banking resources. While loans are now expanding in response to seasonal needs, as these seasonal requirements are liquidated a considerable reduction in the volume of outstanding credit may be anticipated. Meanwhile, through the shifting of credits and through the facilities of the Federal Reserve system, pressure on the banking facilities of particular sections is being distributed throughout the banking system and the strength of the credit structure as a whole is absolutely sound and unimpaired.

"A number of factors have facilitated improvement in the credit outlook. As the continued improvement in transportation permits more normal movements of commodities, the to the United States for material with which to renew and enlarge their working plants. Our exports of railway material in the fiscal year 1920 aggregated over $150,000,000 in value as against $80,000,000 in 1918 and $25,000,000 in the year before the war.

Necessarily (says a statement by the National City Bank of New York) the world's railways "marked time" to a very considerable degree during the war, especially in new construction. Even in our own country the number of miles of road constructed in the six years since the beginning of the war has been little more than that of certain single years during the period of our active railway construction. In Europe the construction of 1920 was $32,000,000 against $10,000,000 in 1914, and of other track materials, including "frogs," switches, spikes, and ties, exported in 1920 $12,000,000 against approximately $5,000,000 in 1914. Railway cars for freight purposes show very large totals in the exports of 1920, $54,000,000, against $13,000,000 in 1918 and $5,000,000 in 1914.

This demand for new material construction or equipment of world railways, adds the bank's statement, is especially interesting as an evidence of the world's growing confidence in the quality of American manufactures. The calls for this high-grade product come from every direction. Of the $53,000,000 worth of freight cars for steam railways exported in 1920 no less than $31,000,000 worth went to France, $11,000,000 to Italy, and $5,000,000 to Cuba. Of the $32,000,000 worth of steel rails exported in 1920 the distribution was much wider, $12,000,000 worth to Japan, $5,000,000 to Cuba, $1,000,000 to China, including the leased territory of Kwang-tung, $1,500,000 worth to Brazil, $1,300,000 to France, $2,000,000 to British South Africa, $1,300,000 worth to the Philippines, $1,500,000 worth to the Dutch East Indies, and three-quarters of a million dollars to Peru. Of the $43,000,000 worth of locomotives exported in 1920 over $6,000,000 worth went to Italy, $2,000,000 worth to France, $4,000,000 to Cuba, $2,500,000 to Brazil, $4,000,000 to China including Kwang-tung, nearly a million dollars' worth to Russia in Europe, and one-half million dollars' worth to Russia in Asia, while our near-by neighbors, Canada and Mexico, took about one-half million dollars' worth each.

The unsold portion of the new issue of common shares of the White House, San Francisco's famous department store, have been purchased by Stephens & Co., and are placed on the market at 104. The purchaser will, in buying this stock, receive all accrued dividends since February 1, 1920.

Capitalization of the White House, when this issue was first placed on the market, was as follows: Authorized (50,000 common shares), $5,000,000; to be presently outstanding (42,500 shares), $4,250,000; held in treasury for future corporate purposes (7500 shares), $750,000.

Until quite recently the capitalization of the White House was $1,500,000 of common stock. This has been increased, as above noted, to $5,000,000, of which $750,000 par value remains unsold against future needs; $1,500,000, or 15,000 shares, has been issued to former stockholders, to divide a tremendous surplus accumulated during the last ten years, and 12,500 shares, or $1,250,000 par value, has been offered to stockholders for subscription, three-quarters of which has been subscribed by stockholders in the United States; but, unfortunately, due to the present condition of foreign exchange, the French stockholders of the company could not avail themselves of the privilege, and there is therefore offered for public subscription the remainder.

The company has no preferred stock or funded debt, with the exception of a collateral trust note issue amounting to $750,000, maturing serially December, 1920 to 1924, inclusive, secured by a pledge with trustee, of United States government, California state and municipal and high-grade railroads bonds.

A new issue of $2,285,000 City of Ottawa, Canada, 6 per cent. bonds (coupon bonds) in denominations of $1000, $500, and $100 is being offered by E. H. Rollins & Sons and the Guaranty Trust Company of New York. These bonds are an obligation of the city at large.

Ottawa, Ontario, which was incorporated as a city in 1854, is the capital of the Dominion of Canada. The excellent transportation facilities furnished by its position on the Ottawa River and its numerous railroads have facilitated its development as an industrial centre. The valuable forests of the neighborhood furnish abundant raw material and make the lumber industry the most important in the city. Other lines of manufacture represented here are paper mills, match factories, foundries, cement, and carhide factories.

Durell Gregory & Co. of New York, for whom H. Vincent Brand & Co. are Western correspondents, is now planning to enter the foreign field and is contemplating the opening of offices in London, Paris, and other Continental financial centres. The firm will soon be in position to give to its clients the benefits of intimate service in connection with bonds and currencies of foreign governments and securities traded in on foreign exchanges.

Carstens & Earles, Incorporated, are participating in an offer of $4,000,000 Massey-Harris Company, Ltd. (Canada) and Massey-Harris Harvester Company (United States) ten-year 8 per cent. gold bonds dated October 15, 1920. Coupon bonds in denominations of $1000, redeemable as a whole at 107 and interest on any interest date on thirty days' notice. The companies agree to pay the United States normal income tax up to 2 per cent. per annum if exemption is not claimed. The business carried on by the Massey-Harris Company, Ltd. (Canada) was established in 1847 and the company is now the largest manufacturer of agricultural implement machinery in the British Empire.

The Canadian company operates through Canada, and has a large business in Great Britain, Australia, and other parts of the British Empire, and in South America, France, and other European countries.

The business of the Massey-Harris Harvester Company was established in 1850. Control was acquired by the Canadian company in 1910. The two companies have since been operated under one general management.

The American company distributes throughout the United States and also does a large foreign business.

The companies have six plants, comprising 161 acres, with a floor area of eighty-three acres, and employ 5400 people.

Recognizing a need and an opportunity, the Sperry Flour Company, through its board of directors, recently proffered a fellowship in home economics to Mills College, the West's one women's college, which has been conducting a campaign for an adequate endowment fund. The board of trustees of the college promptly and graciously accepted the proposal, and the fellowship has been established. It is hoped thus to encourage the study of domestic science and the broad field of home economics—a field that affords trained women a career giving full play to ability and ambition.

Announcement has just been received from the college that the fellowship has been granted to Beth Dysart of Pacific Grove, a graduate of Mills College in the class of 1916. During the first year following her graduation Miss Dysart was organizer and manager of the College Shoppe, on the Mills College campus. She then went to France with the Red Cross as canteen worker, remaining at Dijon and later at Treves for eleven months. Since returning to California she has been assistant dietitian at the Fairmont Hospital, San Francisco.

In undertaking graduate work in home economics at Mills College she will have as her new roads was, of course, limited by war demands and in many cases the destruction far exceeded the construction. In other parts of the world which had relied chiefly upon Europe for financing new construction and supplying materials therefor the industry of railroad building came also to practically a standstill, and the world's railway mileage emerged from the war period showing but a small percentage of gain over that at its beginning.

It is not surprising then, adds the bank's statement, to find that our exports of materials for railways in 1920 are six times as much in value as in the year preceding the war. Indeed the grand total of material exported for railways would probably approximate, and perhaps exceed, $200,000,000 if complete figures could be obtained. In certain lines such as steel rails, other track materials, locomotives, and cars, both freight and passenger, exact figures are available, but it is not practicable to determine what proportion of the $25,000,000 worth of structural steel or the $50,000,000 worth of metal-working machinery exported in 1920 was for the railways. In locomotives alone the total exports in the fiscal year 1920 amounted to $43,000,000 against $25,000,000 in 1919 and less than $4,000,000 in the fiscal year 1914, all of which preceded the war. The Top of the World.

We may sometimes have wondered where Ethel M. Dell finds her heroes, but at least she never wrote a tiresome story, nor a commonplace one. And her last novel is no exception the rule.

Sylvia Ingleton on her father's second marriage finds that life has become unendurable to her, and therefore she takes the desperate step of cabling to her lover Guy in South Africa to ask if she may go out to him. She receives an affirmative reply, but on her arrival at a desolate South African station she is met by her lover's cousin, Drake, who reluctantly explains to her that Guy sent her the message while he was drunk, that he is hopelessly degraded and has actually disappeared. Drake asks Sylvia to save the situation by marrying him, and Sylvia consents on the condition that the marriage shall be only formal. Then Guy puts in an appearance, as he was certain to do, and lays fresh siege to Sylvia's heart, and with that strange success that seems usually to attend the love-making efforts of the scoundrel. The story is a rather obvious one and with an obvious ending, but the author's strength is in her characterization, and while this is not quite the best work that she has done it will prove no disappointment to the fastidious novel reader.

THE TOP OF THE WORLD. By Ethel M. Dell. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

"So Saith the Spirit."

This is a volume of so-called spirit communications, and it is by the same King's Counsel who gave us the previous volume, "I Heard a Voice." We are told that the "enthusiastic reception" that greeted the first book has encouraged the author to this further publication.

Books of this kind must be regarded as part and parcel of the work of psychic research in general, and perhaps they should be judged, not as isolated productions, but from the point of view of the larger field of research. It may be said that no one now doubts the reality of these phenomena. The proofs are overwhelming and unanswerable. But there is a great deal of doubt as to their origin, and those who are the best qualified to judge are also the most skeptical. Perhaps the reviewer will have done his whole duty by saying that this particular volume bears every mark of sincerity, that it is written with moderation and restraint, and is even by no means without beauty. The reader will form his own conclusions in accordance with his predilections.

"SO SAITH THE SPIRIT." By a King's Counsel. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $3.50.

Gas.

Mr. Edward S. Farrow, author of this best of all books on gas warfare, believes that gas and military aeronautics will play the principal parts in the next war. Gas, he tells us, is actually a humane weapon, a fact that is now fairly well established. Allied casualties from gas were 2½ per cent., while those from bullets and high explosives were 25 per cent.

In this volume Mr. Farrow tells us everything about the use of gas in war, how the gases are made, how they are discharged, their effects upon the victims, and the appropriate remedies. The number of gases that were used in the war is astonishing. A vast industry was created, and it would seem that the ingenuity of the chemists was greater than has ever been displayed in peace. The volume is completed by appendices and an index.

GAS WARFARE. By Edward S. Farrow. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $3.

Socialism.

Let it be admitted that Mr. J. Bruce Glasier, chairman of the Independent Labor party in England, writes beautifully about socialism. The publishers say truly, but irrelevantly, that this is so, and it is so. Doubtless he could write beautifully about shaving, or postoffices, or appendicitis, or anything. But beauty can hardly be said to help us much toward the solution of an economic problem. It may even be in the way.

Mr. Glasier says nothing new, although he does it remarkably well. He believes that another and more intricate social mechanism would make us happy, and he describes the mechanism in fervid terms. The same belief has been held with the same confidence by generations of reformers, religious, political, economic, educational, and social. Most of them have been allowed to have their way, to tinker with the machine, but without checking the descensus avernii of inequality, avarice, violence. We are now invited to remodel the mechanism, on a more extensive scale than ever before and we have a foreboding that the invitation may be accepted. None the less we have the conviction that it is not the mechanism that is at fault, but rather the motive power of human nature, and that the fundamental weakness of all these schemes is their neglect of the human equation. So long as greed is the dominating factor in human relations it will not be possible to lessen the results of greed, no matter how industriously we may work at the nuts and bolts. But for those who find some gratification in the contemplation of phantoms it may be said that Mr. Glasier has evoked an attractive one.

THE MEANING OF SOCIALISM. By J. Bruce Glasier. New York: Thomas Seltzer.

Henry Elizabeth.

Here we have another of Justin Huntly McCarthy's historical stories, told with the easy fluency and the absence of pedantry that are among their greatest attractions.

Henry Elizabeth is the Master of Braginton in Devonshire and he is also a drunkard and a lout. But fate knocks at the door when a traveling party passes through Braginton and Henry Elizabeth finds himself compelled to fight a duel for which he is in no way fitted and falls in love with a lovely lady who henceforth becomes his guiding star.

Henry Elizabeth renounces his drunken sloth and rides to London to find his lady and to take whatever fate may have in store for him. He is an adaptable fellow, and we discover, moreover, that he is a good deal of a man. Presented to Queen Elizabeth, he is so fortunate as to render that extraordinary woman a service, first by saving her life from plotters and then by extirpating a nest of rebels. Indeed his adventures are continuous and we need no forewarning that he will find again the lady who has alike enchanted and redeemed him. It is a readable novel, and we particularly appreciate the picture of Elizabeth, which may or may not be accurate, but that is certainly distinctive.

Briefer Reviews.

Little, Brown & Co. have published an attractive volume for little children. It is entitled "The Crystal Ball," by Mary D. Gordon, and it is described as the strange adventures of Joan and Jock in the magical Garden of the Sun. Price, $2.

An admirable little handbook for the dancing aspirant is the "Handbook of Ball Room Dancing," by Paymaster Commander A. M. Cree, R. N., with an introduction by George Grossmith and with many practical diagrams. It is published by the John Lane Company.

An attractively illustrated volume for children comes from Little, Brown & Co. It is entitled "Adventures in Mother Goose Land," by Edward Gowar, with pictures by Alice Bolam Preston. It will be enough to say that little Noel journeys to Mother Goose land and makes new discoveries about the people there. Price, $2.25.

"Famous Psychic Stories," edited by J. Walker McSpadden (Thomas Y. Crowell Company) consists of reprints of weird narratives by Nathaniel Hawthorne, Edgar Allan Poe, Wilkie Collins, Margaret Oliphant, Montague Rhodes James, E. F. Benson, Ambrose Bierce, W. F. Harvey, Elia W. Peattie, Evangeline W. Blashfield, Mary E. Wilkins Freeman, and Isaac K. Funk.

Psychic books come fast, and among the latest is "The Fellowship of the Picture," an automatic script "taken down" by Nancy Dearer, with an introduction by Percy Dearer, M. A., D. D. (E. P. Dutton & Co.; $1.25). Both Dr. Dearer and Mrs. Dearer believe that these communications come from the source indicated in the script itself. It is a belief that the judicious will view with some doubt.

Along my shelves and feel a chill:
"Lavengro" gone! O imbecile
To lend that book! Yes, I am shent.
I'll put your conscience on the grill:
If here are the books that I have lent?

THE BRASS CHECK

A Study of American Journalism

By UPTON SINCLAIR

Ninth edition just sent to press—a total of 144,000 copies.

"The Brass Check" is a book of facts; a book packed solid with facts. Says the introduction:

"Here are names, places, dates—such a mass of material as you can not doubt, you can not evade. Here are your sacred names, the very highest of your gods. When you have read this story, you will know the thing called American Journalism; you will know the body and soul of it."

Says Robert Herrick: "I wish to thank you and congratulate you."

Says Charles Zueblin: "'The Brass Check' ought to raise the roof!" (It has done so.)

Says John Haynes Holmes: "The book is tremendous. I have never read a more strongly consistent argument or one so formidably buttressed by facts. You have proved your case to the hilt. I again take satisfaction in saluting you not only as a great novelist, but as the ablest pamphleteer in America today. I am already passing around the word in my church and taking orders for the book."

Says the Nation (New York): "A most important book . . . a fascinating and thoro treatise upon the American press."

Says the Nation (London): "This astonishing production . . . a highly curious record . . . a telling array of evidence . . . a plain factual record."

Says the Neues Journal (Vienna): "A book-trade 'scoop' without equal . . . a breath-taking, clutching, frightful book."

The Heart of Unaga.

Rumor has it that in the far north there is a tribe of Indians that hibernate, not naturally, but through the use of a narcotic plant. Mr. Cullum uses this idea as a basis for one of the best stories of its kind that we have seen.

Steve Allenwood of the Mounted Police receives orders to undertake a two-year trip to the north in order to investigate the reported murder by Indians of two white traders. Upon his return after almost unbearable hardships he finds that his young wife has eloped with a government official, taking their baby daughter with her. After a fruitless pursuit of the couple, Allenwood returns to the north in order to undertake a search for the strange narcotic plant which he now knows to exist and which, properly used, can be of vast service to the practice of medicine. He takes with him a young white boy and his Indian nurse, whom he had rescued from destitution on the occasion of his first visit. Thenceforth we have the story of his search for the herb under the fiery shadow of the great northern volcano and his ultimate encounter with the man who had ruined his life and the consequent recovery of his daughter, now grown to womanhood. The story is told with exceptional energy by an author who pays to his readers the compliment of thoroughly acquainting himself with the conditions of which he writes.

THE HEART OF UNAGA. By Ridgwell Cullum. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Everyday Americans.

Mr. Canhy, who writes this chatty sketch of the American mind after the war, seems to think that we are all too much alike, too little tolerant of types. That is why it is possible to write of the American mind. It is homogeneous. In certain respects we all talk alike, our newspaper are all alike. The same mind is to be found in the laborer and the farmer, the professional man and the millionaire. If we are not careful it will mean stagnation and therefore "death to the minds that maintain it."

Mr. Canhy deals with the American mind in the course of seven chapters. He treats of conservatism, radicalism, idealism, religion, literature, and the bourgeoisie. On the whole he seems to think that optimism is justified, but there must be some radical changes in our thinking. We are overfond of praising the virtues of our forefathers and the wealth of our compatriots. Our diet of ideals is too large and of practices too small. "Our traits," says the author, "are not the fine exclusiveness, the discrimination, the selfishness of an aristocracy. Nor are they the social solidarity, the intellectual democracy, the intolerance of a proletariat. One finds rather individualism in opinion and unity in thought. One finds conservatism in institutions and radicalism in personal ambitions. One finds a solid, though dull morality, a distrust of ideas, a plentiful lack of taste, an abundance of the homely virtues of industry, truth-telling, optimism, idealism, and charity, which, in an age that suits such talents, make a man healthy, wealthy, and, in his own generation, wise."

REALLY, TRULY GRAND OPERA.

The Frank Healy management has successfully dealt with the stage problem at the Exposition Auditorium by walling off all the space parallel to the front edge of the stage with what looks like stiffened textile; probably hurlap. This cuts off all those aggravatingly useless side seats, and a still further effect of comparative snugness is gained by masking the ceiling with the same fabric.

The stage is thus brought well toward the front centre of the Auditorium, and the audience is proportionately soothed. The element that is missing is, of course, the brilliantly colored curves and the tiers of boxes in an ordinary opera house. Quantities of women honored the occasion by wearing opera costume, but once they sat down their glories were extinguished by being hurried in the dead level.

The performance of "L'Oracolo," with its fine dramatic motive and picturesque Asiatic intrigue, fully sustained the anticipations of the audience, who counted on Scotti's specialty in offering performances of dramatic strength by his general company.

We saw old Chinatown transferred to the stage, with a fine mastery of arts employed to secure the familiar effect. The scene was bizarre, Asiatic, colorful in a random way; just as we remember it before the fire. Ramshackle houses, the dull red of an old brick building with green balconies, brown walls, scraps of orange color flapping on the clothes lines; a painter's picturesque composition, harmoniously colored and dramatically appropriate.

It is midnight, the time of mystery and murder, and Chim Fang, the impassive keeper of a gambling den, dominates the scene. We hear the clamor of excited voices from within echoing the quarrels of the game, and when, occasionally, a Chinese gambler was violently expelled, the scene was so realistic that the full, round, Italian tones of protest gave us a sense of surprise. For Scotti is a masterly constructor of atmosphere, although he can not make Italian voices suggest emergence from a Chinese throat.

Scotti himself is an exceedingly fine actor, and was excellent in indicating the cunning craft and cold Asiatic villainy of Chim Fang.

So the familiar drama goes on; every one has read the story of "The Cat and the Cherub" or seen it played. And as it is developed we realize that "L'Oracolo" is old-fashioned opera under a Chinese mask. The setting, the acting, the orchestration are all so extremely well done that we believe, for a time, that it is a modern work, but gradually the perception comes to us that Franco Leoni, the composer, had not entered into the modern spirit when he composed the work.

His music does not reach a very high plane, and were it not for the fine voices of the singers the dramatic would overtop the musical interest of the performance. For there is an intensity of suggestion throughout the entire drama of absolutely heartless scheming. Murder is a mere incident. The American policeman passes, remaining absolutely deaf, dumb, and blind, as he regards the impassive figures of the silent plotters, to the throbbing nocturnal drama with which the dark night is permeated.

Marie Sundelius' lovely soprano beautifully expressed the gentle tenderness of Ah Yoe's young love, and Mario Chamlee's virile tenor was well adapted to conquer the vast spaces of the huge Auditorium. Every part was well sung, indeed, and a word of high appreciation is due Giovanni Martini for his fine portrayal of the ruthless Winn Shee, a companion portrait to Scotti's impressive depiction of Chim Fang.

"Pagliacci"—Almost immediately the audience felt the difference musically, for here was the score of a master. "Pagliacci" is one of the finest music-dramas we see on the operatic stage, Leoncavallo having made an almost perfect union of text and tone by writing his own book. So well has he done it that the story always grips at once, and the illusion is strong, more particularly because of the simple-naturalness of the comedy relief.

It is not any too often, nevertheless, that we attain to that feeling in opera, but again the fine histrionic quality which the singers put into their rôles made the tragedy tense and terrifying. The quieter, more impassive Chinese tragedy was quite outshone. Here were desperate emotions, founded on the primal passion, instead of gain, singing madly against the hanks of self-control.

Morgan Kingston's Canio was so richly endowed both vocally and emotionally that the singer carried his audience with him on a high tide of feeling.

Anna Roselle presented a striking conception of Nedda, whom she depicted, unlike the simpler being of birdlike joy we are familiar with, as a passionate but shallowly sensual creature; a Carmen-like being, so carnal in feeling as to account for the murderous frenzy to which her infidelity drove her lover. Her costume, too, admirably expressed the psychology of the character, with its glowings of mingled color and its suggestion of bird-like plumage.

Millo Pico and Mario Laurenti are not, perhaps, counted among the stars of the company, but they are both excellent singers and good actors, and their numbers were thoroughly appreciated by a delighted audience.

Naturally, with such a surprisingly fine ensemble, the choral work was beautifully done, there being no evidence of the choral weakness and disunion often perceived in these difficult numbers.

The orchestration was superbly rendered, under the able baton of Carlo Peroni, and although we will all forget his Italian name, it is but just, in view of the exceedingly fine dramatic quality of the two performances, to pay our respects to Amando Agnini, the stage manager, although Scotti is the general director.

"THE ACQUITTAL."

Darwin would certainly have enjoyed this play. Who does not like to have his interest titivated by detective mysteries? I mean more particularly when they are in the drama, and we are protected by a thoughtful playwright from running against those snags of human nature that are so unpicturesquely ugly and sordid in the daily-paper crimes.

"The Acquittal" is full of thrills of interest and suspense, and the author—although a new one, apparently Rita Weiman by name—shows an admirable conciseness in handling her dialogue and working up her thrills. Just that one, apparently, Rita Weiman by name—shows so much in four almost monosyllables.

The author, also, refuses to walk in the beaten track. Her device for establishing her premises in the first act and for ushering in a disarming impression of the villain is decidedly clever, the scene by the slangy reporters highly entertaining, and the structure of the play throughout shows good craftsmanship in placing her effects. Also she piques the curiosity, and, when she makes her startling revelation, does it just in time to intensify the dramatic situation.

It is not surprising that George M. Cohan recognized the possibilities of the play and gave it his usual expert, first-class setting. For the company is very good throughout, and the leading rôles are filled by players who are particularly happy in interpreting the author's intentions.

Harold Vermilye, who was made known to the San Francisco public in "A Tailor Made Man," comes on the scene as a brisk, enterprising reporter. Subsequently he develops into or rather is revealed as a detective sluth of the kind that his author-creator never allows to miss a trick. Sherlock Holmes and his lines of successors did, occasionally, run up against something that they couldn't climb over, but Joe Conway, in the shape of an ornery little reporter, was of the unerring kind. He always held a full hand of aces. And the audience likes it.

Mr. Vermilye in "A Tailor Made Man" didn't ornament his horrowed plumes quite so well as Dudley Ayres of the Alcazar, but he does the sang froid act in "The Acquittal" in first-class shape. Also he wins the suffrage of his audience, carrying them sweepingly with him to each triumphant curtain.

Marie Louise Walker supplies the romantic element, being pretty and interestingly repressed in her depiction of the wife's knowledge of the damniog secret. And when Madeline let herself go, and the flood of horror, revolt, and accusing revelation burst forth, the actress revealed herself as mistress of the art of expressing dramatic emotion in a manner to thrill the audience into the appropriate condition of burning sympathy.

Kernan Cripps seems to have tamed his former ebullience and cheerful unction to the more strenuous demands required in a rôle of villainy. He is a better actor than he used to be, and expressed the cornered-rat feeling of a cowardly criminal with great effectiveness.

Mildred Southwick also was required to express volumes of secret knowledge hidden away under an imperturbable exterior, and did her share in creating the illusion that every one was walking on dangerous explosives.

Nine other rôles are required to complete the list; and all are carefully and effectively presented. That makes thirteen all told, but the technical efficiency of the author is shown by her skillful way of manipulating not only the subsidiary people, and utilizing them with an economy of dialogue that is most commendable, but also by the much of meaning that is expressed in the little of words. For instance, like the "Her name is Conway" previously referred to, the remark of Conway about the diminished number of strychnine pellets in the box also conveys an infinity of meaning; a meaning which involves the punishment and suppression of the guilty and the projection of a just faintly indicated romance, which also receives a further suggestion from the brief announcement "My sister"—with a word or two further to deprive the information conveyed of inartistic abruptness.

In fact it is very plain that Rita Weiman has not rushed into play-writing without giving herself a good equipment of stage technic. It is also probable that so clever a technician—for one who seems, from the unfamiliarity of her name, to be a beginner in the field—has done service as a player.

Naturally, being a George M. Cohan production, the performance is stage-directed with great efficiency. There are a number of pregnant pauses in the play that are fairly hursting with significance, but they are extremely well done, every one of them contributing to the state of high tension enjoyed by the audience.

The author has the opening scene begin with a vacant stage, and the final curtain also falls upon an unpopulated scene; one of the effects which show that she feels no necessity to walk in ruts.

HYGIENE IN THE DRAMA.

Everything gets there eventually, so in "A Cure for Curables" at the Alcazar the business man, nerve-depleted by over-responsibility, the elegant lady enfeebled by too much ardor in the pursuit of pleasure, and others in the chase for health, may find in light, amusing, dramatic shape the application of the doctor's tedious and rarely followed advice; i. e., exercise, fresh air, and plain food.

The play is by Earl Derr Biggers, author of that highly entertaining piece of dramatic in-

Vacant, But Wasting Water

Property-owners who are not careful sometimes pay higher water bills for vacant premises than they pay for premises which are occupied.

Neglect of leaking fixtures causes this abnormal condition.

Here is an account which strikingly illustrates this phase of water waste:

	Consumption.	Bill.
March	500	$1.85
April	500	1.85
May	400	1.61
June	18,300	40.07
July	3,000	7.85
August	300	1.37
September	600	2.09

The premises consist of three stores, a soft drink saloon and a pool hall. Since May the pool hall has been to let.

As soon as the enormous June delivery of water was reported by the meter reader, our Service Department made an inspection.

A defective toilet in the vacant pool hall was running at full head, wasting into the sewer some 4000 gallons of water a day!

Our Service Department immediately notified the owner, but he was not equally prompt in acting, as the July registration shows. By August, however, consumption was normal.

This, of course, is an extreme case, but it shows what can happen if vacant premises are neglected.

The careful property-owner turns off every water fixture at the angle-valve as soon as his property is vacated.

genuity, "The Seven Keys of Baldpate," with the assistance of William Hodge, the well-known comedian. It is really a farce-comedy, since the motive is so farcical, the proprietor of a sanitarium having on his death devised it to a kinsman on condition that the young doctor cures ten patients in thirty days. However, there is no buffoonery in the piece, and perhaps even some simple souls may derive from the wisdom of the young doctor some guidance for themselves, since an entertaining play often makes more impression than dull and unwelcome advice.

Some two dozen players are needed adequately to represent the piece, and there are six or seven new faces in evidence, the Alcazar always seeming to have useful reserves to draw on.

The audience testified much enjoyment at seeing its favorites tackling the nimble boe and rake and setting forth to do field work in pursuit of health, and café-haunters seemed to approve with laughing inconsistency of the regimen of bread and milk served as dinner for the healthfully fatigued toilers.

The play being located in Virginia, the musical programme consisted entirely of old Southern airs, which the audience applauded vigorously. Also they enjoyed the settings, which, as is invariably the case at the Alcazar, were appropriate and picturesque.

The mission of the play is purely to amuse, but since a sanitarium does its full share in serving as the background for romance, the author does not hesitate to allow the young doctor to win a sweetheart from among his patients, thoughtfully selecting for that purpose the one among the women patients who had the least ailment.

There's a villain in the play, too, which kind of stiffens things up, for a short time, into a suggestion of melodrama. In fact the complaisant author allows his play to reflect various passing ripples: the bridge-and-cabaret-jaded devotee, the business man, nerve-worn and testy, the farmer who is yelping for hired hands, the gouty subject who swears chronically, the drunkard who wants to be cured, all pass in turn before the tribunal in front, each winning a passing ripple of amusement.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The San Francisco Symphony Orchestra's advance concert at the Exposition Auditorium last Saturday night was listened to with that genuine musical appreciation, for which a considerable share of gratitude is due to this trained body of musicians, by upwards of seven thousand people. So long have the instrumentalists worked together that the summer cessation of the concerts fails to mar their admirable tone-work.

The "Leonore" overture of Beethoven, Handel's Largo, two movements of the always loved "Pathétique" and the "Meistersinger" overture were the principal numbers. The "Kol Nidrei," played by Horace Britt, was intensely appreciated, and Edwin Lemare rendered the "Fugue à la Gigue" of Bach on the organ.

The latter part of the programme contained lighter selections, a Johann Strauss number, Mendelssohn's Spring Song, the "Poet and Peasant" overture of Suppe, and some others. The programme was of liberal quantity, but the general audience maintained its attitude of profound enjoyment at the close.

The stand-bys, however, will be glad to have the concerts in the regular place, as some noticed a faint muffledness of tone in certain parts of the house, and others felt that the harmonies showed a tendency to become diffused in the vast spaces. The leader, Alfred Hertz, received a demonstration of warm welcome when he first appeared.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

George M. Cohan's new mystery play, "The Acquittal," has made a tremendous impression at the Columbia Theatre, where on Sunday night it will enter upon the second and final week of its engagement. Harold Vermilye, who will be remembered for his John Paul Bart in "A Tailor Made Man" of last season, appears in the rôle of the young newspaper man, Conway, who takes it upon himself to unravel the mystery of "The Acquittal." There are action, tense situations, and superb acting in this attraction.

The Alcazar Theatre.

The laughter and cheer of "A Cure for Curables," that find expression at the Alcazar this week, will give way next Sunday to the tense emotionalism of "The Hypocrites." It is by Henry Arthur Jones and achieved sensational success when produced in London and New York by the late Charles Frohman. "The Hypocrites" is one of the finest dramatic documents that ever reached the English-speaking stage. In adroitness of construction, in faultless technic, in superb literary quality, as well as in forceful acting opportunities, this simple story of a girl's betrayal and her rehabilitation stands recognized as one of the masterpieces of the modern stage. Its scenes are laid in England, depicting the struggle of a fearless young clergyman and the smug Pharisees who vainly seek to dominate him. There is a picked cast, with Dudley Ayres as the curate of Weybury, Inez Ragan as the wronged girl Rachel Neve, Brady Kline as the master of Plugnet Court, Rafael Brunetto as the lord of the manor, Ben Erway as his profligate son, Emily Melville as the scheming mother, Emily Pinter as the high-minded fiancée, Henry Shumer as the sly, sleek vicar, Al Cunningham as the financial agent, Charles Murphy and May Nannery as the doctor and his wife, Gladys Emmons as the wife of the curate, Walter Belasco and Dorothy Bartley as house servants.

The farcical comedy, new to this city, "Too

Many Husbands," follows Sunday, November 17th. It is by W. Somerset Maugham and was a great success in New York when produced last season by A. H. Woods at the Booth Theatre.

The Maitland Playhouse.

The reorganized Maitland Players, headed by Arthur Maitland and augmented by Miss Mildred Cates, a charming leading woman, and Arthur Allard of Los Angeles, who is to be seen in important rôles during the season, will present "The Typhoon" this coming week at the Maitland.

"The Typhoon" is the story of a Japanese scientist who is studying conditions in Europe. He falls in love with a German woman, who leads him on and finally spurns him. There is a wonderful opportunity for dramatic incidents during the course of the play and they will be made the most of by Maitland and his associates.

Theatre-goers have been charmed with the Galsworthy play, "The Eldest Son," the modern society drama that will come to a close on Saturday with matinee and evening performance.

The Orpheum.

Notable Harry Fox is the Orpheum's headliner for next week. Fox was in vaudeville with the Millership Sisters, with Yanci Dolly, and by himself. His return here will be a sort of home-coming, a week of jollification in the Orpheum. Beatrice Curtis, conceded by Harrison Fisher to be the most beautiful miss on the American stage, is Fox's partner.

Willis Clark, also here next week, is a pioneer in the field of one-act plays. This season his vehicle will be "A Good Bad Man," in which he portrays the middle-aged man of the world.

Earle S. Dewey and Mabel "Billie" Rogers come in "No Tomorrow," a vaudeville oddity, which affords them opportunity for singing, dancing, and dialogue.

Billy Shone's contribution will be a number of songs and stories tied with a thread of an idea. He is reputed to be extremely successful in his line of work.

The Four Harmony Kings, negroes with a sense of harmony and humor, described as "A Symphony in Color," will be another of the next week's Orpheum features.

The Three Lordons will offer an exceptionally clever bar act with different variations from their predecessors. Their unusual tricks will be put over in a comedy vein.

Two prodigies in the seal family are Wastiska and Understudy, noted for their intelligence and the number of amusing feats they perform.

Sheila Terry, headliner of this week, continues. Films and orchestra provide the other ingredients of the bill.

Players Theatre.

The long anticipated opening of the fall repertory season at the Players Theatre, on Bush Street, near Octavia, takes place Friday evening, October 8th. The charming little playhouse has been completely redecorated for the occasion, and Director Reginald Travers promises an auspicious première with a bill of four one-act plays by local authors, each one being a first presentation. "Charity," by Charles Caldwell Dobie, has the following cast: Charles Trowbridge, Jane Parent, Carl Kroenke, Virginia Sciaroni, and Rosetta Baker. "Thieves," a whimsicality by Helen Mitchell, will be interpreted by Carolyn Green, Estelle Loney, Kathleen Rucker, Talma-Zetta Wilbur, Beatrice Bacigalupi, and Madeleine Harrington. "The China King's Daughter" is an extravaganza by Henry Kirk and should prove a novelty, having a cast of real Chinese. Dan Totheroh has contributed a very strong drama of early California entitled "The Breaking of the Calm." In this cast are Hilda Deniville, Carl Kroenke, Harold Weule, Percy McGuire, Joseph Carson Sturgis, and Rudolph Hess.

A request performance of "Richard II" with William S. Rainey is scheduled for Saturday evening.

Monday night marks the first production in San Francisco of Gilbert and Sullivan's light opera, "Ruddigore." The Players have a splendid cast of forty-four people and an augmented orchestra under the direction of George Edwards. The cast includes Miriam Elkus, Easton Kent, Reginald Travers, Mabel Gump, Jane Parent, Benjamin Purrington, Ruth Bates, Harry Coles, Emanuel Rosenthal, and Carolyn Kroenke.

The repertory for the remainder of the week is as follows: Tuesday, one-act plays; Wednesday, "Ruddigore"; Thursday, "Richard"; Friday, one-act plays; Saturday, "Ruddigore."

Seats may be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s or at the theatre box-office. A considerable saving is effected by purchasing season coupon books.

Symphony Orchestra.

The San Francisco Symphony Orchestra will give its first Sunday symphony concert in the Curran Theatre on next Sunday afternoon.

Sixteen years in the service of San Francisco and her visitors. Holding constantly to the same ideal of fulfilling all and only the legitimate functions of a restaurant, it has not been necessary to alter the character of this restaurant's appeal to its patrons.

Breakfast, Luncheon, Tea and Dinner

For this occasion a well-balanced programme has been prepared, which consists of Beethoven's third symphony, the "Eroica," Richard Strauss' symphonic poem "Don Juan," and "Italia," by Alfredo Casella. The latter work, which is new to San Francisco, is a rhapsody on Sicilian and Neapolitan songs.

On the following Sunday, October 17th, the first popular concert will be given. The principal items will be Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, the prelude to the third act of Wagner's "Lohengrin," Saint-Saëns' symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," the melodious "Coppelia" ballet suite of Delibes, and Schumann's ever-welcome "Traumerei."

VANITY FAIR.

Mr. W. L. George, writing in the New York Tribune, describes his sensations as he approached the coast of America. One's impressions of America are supposed to begin about the fourth day at sea, so that one may be all ready for the interviewer, who will assuredly ask them at the foot of the gangway—that is to say, if the traveler is important enough to have impressions. Mr. W. L. George tells us that he began to arrange his impressions by making judicious remarks to a steward who seemed to him to be the most typical of Yankees, but who subsequently turned out to be an Irishman from New Mexico. Mr. George broke the ice, so to speak, with some appropriate remarks about the land of the brave and the home of the free, but the steward advised him to keep that sort of stuff in the cyclone cellar until the next Fourth. Democratic institutions, explained the steward, were annual occasions and out of season just at the moment. So Mr. George put his helms hard over and sailed away gayly on another tack:

The brief pronouncement is a little discouraging, so I shift the conversation to women, a ground together more sympathetic and more familiar. "I'm told that I am going to be dazzled by the beauty of the American women."

"I reckon you will. You'll see more live things on Broadway in an hour than you'll have time to break your neck over in a year."

"Oh!" I protest, "I'm not going over with Mormon intentions."

"Better not. You'd have the cops after you if you did!" For the first time enthusiasm enters the steward's voice. "You know, you can't get fresh in the States. Knocking around in London and Southampton as I do, it sort of makes you compare things. One thing an Englishman's got to realize is, America's pure."

"But," I cry, "I've been reading a novel about seamy New York by David Graham Phillips."

"Never heard of him."

"Well, there's Reginald Wright Kauffman."

"Novels ain't true, are they? I don't know why anybody wastes his time over them."

"No more do I," I reply with understanding. "But a stranger must get his impressions when he can, and the little I know about American women I can only get from books."

"American women," repeated the steward meditatively, "they're like the rest. Women are all alike. Some are worse."

"That's rather a cynical view," I remark. "But don't you think the American woman may be different from the others? This boat is full of them, and already I seem to have noticed a seriousness I am not accustomed to in their English sisters, a desire to inform themselves, an interest in literature, and ideas, a keenness which is quite new to me."

"It won't be new long," replies the steward, bitterly. Then, cautiously: "Of course, if you've married an American."

I reassure him. I even make an allusion to the American husband. As he is an American husband this seems to inflame the steward. He evidently has a grievance.

"People come over," he grumbles. "They kinder stick a pin through the American. Like a beetle. And put him in a museum. With a label round his neck: 'American Husband. Guaranteed not to wear and tear.'" I laugh. This does not mollify him: "People in England say to me that the women have it all their own way in America. They seem to think we throw a million dollars into the lap of the old woman and tell her to go out and buy a shirtwaist. That we haven't a mind of our own. That we hang gifts on the Christmas trees. That our way of doing business is to knock at the wife's door and ask, 'Say, Mamie, what do you want me to think?' That's the American husband's programme, according to the English." I protest that he exaggerates. To which he briefly replies: "I didn't start the exaggeration." Then he sketches me the American husband as a man of blood, whose womankind tremble at his frown, who returns from his daily carnage in office or factory demanding to be entertained by pretty faces, good clothes, pleasant gossip, and who is not to be contradicted.

I seem to recognize the type. Can it be universal? Can it be that my vision of the American husband, with a face by Harrison Fisher and a soul by Gene Stratton-Porter, is also an exaggeration? Are all my ideas of America exaggerated? I suggest this to the steward, but he seems conscious of having been libeled in some obscure way. From the heights of his philosophic observation he describes a most unsatisfactory America, where meals, morals, and manners recall those of the Continent I have left behind, where idealism takes its proper place in the train of advantage, where people make pianos and ash trays, as we do; play the first and fill the second, as we do; where railway trains run on wheels, and where cows have four legs. This is most disappointing. Such an expensive journey to find in the New World only the Old World—more so. I won't believe it. America can not be like Europe; she couldn't be so silly. America must be different; she shall be different. To me, Columbia shall be the Gibson Girl. She shall embody all my illusions, even though the steward says one doesn't acquire new ones as one goes on. Is he a wise man, or just a man embittered by his life between two worlds, like a squirrel in a wheel at the mercy of the turbines, between two worlds, and of none? So I leave him. He loads me with no final message. In direct sentences he has said what he had to say, using the word "Yep" only once, and the word "Nup" not at all. Already he is returning to that state of wakefulness which so successfully conceals slumber.

Mr. George confesses that he had made a strong mental picture of what he would find in America. He had read Mr. Arnold Bennett and other veracious writers and he had also called on his imagination:

I have a vision of the hotels I am going to visit, to say nothing of their bills. I rather look forward to the hotels themselves, to their sixty floors, their dancing halls on the roof, their reproductions of the seaside in the basement. But I am nervous when I reflect on the labor-saving bedroom, with its button for fresh air, button for hot air (essential to writers), ice-chest, electric heater, radiator, bed lights, letter chute, and automatic telephone. It is going to be shattering. I know that before I have done I shall try to obtain a small glass of lemonade and find that I have been put through to the governor of California. It is all going to be very modern, as well as very swift. And I'm not wholly modern; I haven't even been up in an aeroplane. And the bill! You've no idea how terrified we are of the American bill. Mr. Arnold Bennett wrote a little book on how to live on twenty-four hours a day, but on how to live on $24 an hour he maintains, in his delightful book, "Those United States," a regrettable silence. And I understand that I shan't get my boots cleaned for six months. It is going to be very exciting.

I am afraid that part of our vision of America comes through the cinema, and the operator does turn the handle so fast. He opens and closes so many doors simultaneously. He piles before our modest European eyes such costly furs, upon such beautiful women, in such enormous automobiles. Can it be that the cinema exaggerates? Surely there must be an America both sleepy and cheap! As I look at the map and read names such as Concord, N. H., or Greeley, Colo., I tell myself that this modest lettering can not represent a cinematic America. But rumor and the cinema are too strong for us, and there rises before my eyes a vision of the really rich man's home, a combination by Frank Norris and Miss Lillian Barrett. It stands on Fifth Avenue, or on Riverside Drive; it has a forecourt of Byzantine mosaic roofed in Carrara marble. Columns. Fountain. Goldfish. Staircase of wrought iron, from a French Renaissance chateau. Black oak panels, linen pattern, from a ducal mansion in Somersetshire. Drawing room: Walls upholstered in George III brocade, Marie Antoinette's own chairs, Chopin's piano, Omar Khayyam's carpet. You see, we think you very rich. We are also impressed in advance by your achievements in comfort. We imagine the rich American's bathroom: Walls made of plate glass, crystal bath, gold taps. Of course, sixteen appliances for hot water, cold water, scented water, medicated water, Russian bath, Turkish bath, shower bath, needle bath; the others do not occur to my European simplicity. And so on. Beyond the house the garage for the automobiles, the hangar for the planes, the kennel for the late Empress of China's Pekingese, the stable for the Derby winners. Yes, the European imagination does get some way when it dwells on real American luxury, when it encourages its vision of the Gainsborough in the servants' hall, and of the Velasquez in the kitchen. It creates a picture of America that is a mid-summer madness, a pageant of wealth, energy, and fantasy. It makes ready to meet the roughness of the Virginia pioneer, the sophistication of the aesthetes of Greenwich Village, the octopus struggle of Wall Street, and the reposeful lawns of Harvard and Yale. It creates the American scene in the highest colors. It prepares to enter what Mr. Wells calls the pleasure cities. It figures a country together Oriental and scientific, a dream and a business, too.

Mr. George allows it to be seen in his concluding paragraph that he is already a little doubtful as to the accuracy of these anticipations. Doubtless we shall hear more about this later on.

Serum remedies for asthma contain such substances as cat's fur, goose feathers, dog's hair, horse's mane, fish, onions, or other ingredients, according to the specific cause of the patient's asthma. Some cases are caused by inhalation of horse odor and dandruff; hence the inclusion of the offending substance in the curative serum.

Heating Problem Solved

The usual kindling of fire and running up and down stairs to maintain it, makes lots of work, and if servants are not available, and if work devolves upon members of the household. The greatest labor-saving device of the day is the

Automatic Gas Furnace

Electrically controlled by a little clock and thermostat upstairs, set the clock for seven in the morning—your house will be warm when you arise. Set the thermostat for 68 degrees of heat—the automatic device will then maintain it all day long. All you need to do is wind the little clock once a week.

The Automatic Furnace does all the work

No trip to the basement is ever necessary, yet perfect heating service is enjoyed from one year's end to the next.

The electric control is constantly on guard to insure uniformity in temperature, so important to the health of the family. The Automatic Furnace can be installed in any home.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Pete Horhack claims that the oldest joke is the one about the Irishman who was handling dynamite in a quarry. He let a stick drop, and the whole box went up, taking Mike with it. The quarry boss came around later and said to another Irishman: "Where's Mike?" "He's gone," replied Pat. "When will he be back?" asked the boss. "Well," replied Pat, "if he comes back as fast as he went, he'll be back yesterday."

"Jinks," said the manager of the bank, "there'll be a vacancy at the head office shortly, and I'm thinking of nominating your twin brother for the job." "My twin brother!" exclaimed Jinks. "But—" "I mean the one I saw watching a ball game yesterday while you were at your aunt's funeral," said the manager. "Oh—er—yes," said Jinks. "I—I remember! I—I'll go and hunt him!" "Good!" said the manager. "And don't come back till you've found him."

Mrs. Sutton advertised for a woman to do general housework, and in answer a colored girl called, announcing that she had come for the position. "Are you a good cook?" asked Mrs. Sutton. "No, indeed, I don't cook," was the reply. "Are you a good laundress?" "I wouldn't do washin' and ironin'; it's too hard on the hands." "Can you sweep?" asked Mrs. Sutton. "No," was the positive answer. "I'm not strong enough." "Well," said the lady of the house, quite exasperated, "may I ask what you can do?" "I dusts," came the placid reply.

Ex-Ambassador Walter Hines Page was formerly one of the editors of World's Work and, like all editors, was obliged to refuse a great many stories. A lady once wrote him: "Sir—You sent back last week a story of mine. I know that you did not read the story. For as a test I had pasted together pages 18, 19, and 20, and the story came back with these pages still pasted; and so I know you are a fraud and turn down stories without reading same." Mr. Page wrote back: "Madam—At breakfast when I open an egg I don't have to eat the whole egg to discover it is bad."

A medical corps officer chanced upon a negro acquaintance of civil life one day in France. "How do you like the army, Mose?" he asked. "'S'll right so far, cap'n," replied the negro, "but Ah don't know how I'm going to like it when dem Germans shoots at me." "Don't worry about that," replied the officer. "All you have to do is zig-zag." And he demonstrated. The next time the two met the negro was in a hospital. "What's the matter with you, Mose?" asked the officer. "Ah aint sure, cap'n, but Ah think Ah must been ziggin' 'bout de time Ah oughta been zaggin'."

A young fellow who was the crack sprinter of his town—somewhere in the South—was unfortunate enough to have a very dilatory laundress. One evening when he was out for a practice run in his rather airy and abbreviated track costume, he chanced to dash past the house of that dusky lady, who at the time was a couple of weeks in arrears with his washing. He had scarcely reached home again when the hell rang furiously and an excited voice was wafted in from the porch: "Foh de Lawd's sake, won't you all tell Marse Bob please not to go out no moh till I kin git his clo'es round to him?"

As the Londoner sat in the village inn drinking a modest pint and chatting with the local residents, he got on the subject of married life. He advanced the opinion that true happiness was more often to be found in the peaceful country than amid the turmoil of a city. "Well, I aint so sure about that," said one old chap. "But I do know as I sat last night and held my old woman's hands for two hours by the clock." "There," said the visitor in triumph. "That upholds my argument, and shows how much you love her." "Love her!" gasped the old chap. "Why, if I'd a' let go she'd 'ave scratched my bloomin' eyes out!"

The unsettlement of foreign exchange has bred a considerable contempt for foreign currency in the minds of certain Americans. The American father of one Yank who had stayed in France to "clean things up" had established a generous line of credit for him. Friend son began to hit things up rather hard, and in consequence the father received a cablegram reading: "Your son's account already overdrawn one hundred thousand." To which he cabled back to the bankers: "If you mean dollars, send him home; if you mean pounds, tell him to be careful; if you mean those funny little things, let him have all he wants."

A local Cræsus, who has a good rating in the financial directories, recently visited his bank and requested a loan of $10. "But you have a deposit of about $40,000!" exclaimed the president of the bank. "Why should you wish to borrow a trifle like that?" Cræsus persisted in his demand and the bank president smilingly gave him a check for the desired amount. "What collateral are you offering?" inquired the president. "One hundred thousand dollars in Liberty bonds," replied Cræsus, drawing an envelope from his pocket. "Here they are. Good-morning." But the president halted him. "Now that the loan has been made in the usual fashion," he said,

"would you mind telling me your object in putting up $100,000 as collateral?" "Just this," explained Cræsus. "Think how much it would cost me to keep these bonds in a safe deposit vault!"

A workman in a factory received a bad cut on the face. Before they could get him to the doctor's office he fainted. The first thing the doctor did was to pour a large drink of hotted-in-bond down him. The doctor then dressed his wound and the man went his way. But in about a half-hour the man was back at the office with his wife, and as he came in he said: "She won't believe me." "Won't believe what?" exclaimed the doctor. With that the wife cried out, "I've lived with this man too long not to know when he's drunk and been fightin'."

"Good old college days" are not always convenient social assets. A Columbia alumnus recently invited a pretty young woman to dine with him at a restaurant near the campus. "I used to go there when I was at college," he explained. "And I'll show you something of the atmosphere we used to have." The young woman consented eagerly. "Ah," remarked the man as they sat down, "there's the fellow who used to wait on me. Hello, Tony!" Tony greeted his customer effusively. "See?" said the man. "Tony remembers me from the old days." "Sure I remember him, miss," agreed Tony. "He used to come in here every noon with a different girl."

He was a stranger in the town and was obviously looking for an address. But he went about in that half-ashamed way peculiar to shy people as though the mere fact of being a stranger were a crime of the worst description. He was getting hopeless about ever reaching his destination, when he espied a small and ragged urchin standing dejectedly on the curb. To this urchin he made his way and with the hectic flush of shame on his cheeks addressed him almost apologetically: "I—er—want to go to the electric light station," he murmured. The youngster eyed him sourly for a moment. "All right," he said. "Trot along."

THE MERRY MUSE.

Love's Archery.

I have to laugh when people say
Love's the great archer of the day,
And never fails to make a hit,
If so he puts his mind to it.

Love is my friend. I know that he Knows not a thing of archery,
And never learned the gentle art
Of speeding arrow or the dart.

His reputation old and ripe
As Marksman is the purest pipe.
Indeed, he is no shot at all—
He merely aims, and then we fall.
—John Kendrick Bangs in Life.

Quite So.

The movies are an awful bore,
They do not mean a thing to me,
Whenever I go I wax full sore,
And flee.

The "Current News" is so much rot,
The "Thriller" is a mass of frauds,
My roommate likes the vamp a lot,
Ye gawds!

And then sometimes the plot gets rough,
The last long reel is almost through,
And do I like that close-up stuff—
I do!! —Yale Record.

Nailing a Calumny.

Our worthy Puritans, I gather
From reading tough old Cotton Mather
And sifting legend, fact, and rumor,
Were wholly destitute of humor.
A chosen race of pious Grundys,
They duly thanked their God on Sundays
When providential chills-and-fevers
Erased the Redskin unbelievers.
Remorseless Greek and Hebrew scholars,
They were uncompromising collarers
And gloomy headgear, cloaks, and breeches;
But, please!—they did not burn their witches!

As long as Time his pathway trudges
We'll hold against them sundry grudges—
Those joyless, tyrannous fanatics
Who stored grim furniture in attics.
They frowned on sport (though everybody
Was free to take his daily toddy);
Disenters all to them were fakery;
They prisoned, flogged, and banished Quakers;
Yet, while it pleased their sombre fancy
That amateurs of necromancy
Should be high-hanged in hempen hitches,
At least they never burned their witches.

They had their faults, those brave old fellows
Whose iron aspect distance mellowed;
They had no tolerance whatever
For things we justify as "clever";
They held, like some alive at present,
That nothing could be Right and Pleasant,
Yet killed off all their homely ladies
As patently in league with Hades.
Their creed and politics were tribal;
But let us brand the ancient libel
As false as extra curls and switches—
They never, never burned their witches!
—Arthur Guiterman in Life.

The Late Sam Bell McKee.

There comes into the world now and again men and women in whom the Christ-spirit finds reflection and expression. None know them but are the better for the influences that flow from them. Of such was Sam Bell McKee. In the man—in all his comings and goings throughout the sixty years of his pilgrimage—there was the light of graces that dignify human character. The fortitude that meets the vicissitudes of life unshaken, the courage that quails before no mishap of fortune, the kindness that puts others before self, the charity that seeks and finds good in all, the manly strength that overcomes even pain and grief—these were blended in the character of Sam Bell McKee. There were shadows that might have darkened the spirit of one less vital in mind, less master of himself. His spirit rose superior to them and turned them into sources of moral power.

It is sweet to reflect that life yielded much to this rare man. Public respect and confidence, professional usefulness, a wide and deep friendship—these were his portion as a man among men. Better than all were the sympathy and devotion that blessed all his days within the four walls of home. A. H.

The Doctor's Daughters.

Back in the mid-eighties—thirty-five years ago—there was instituted in San Francisco by the Rev. Dr. Mackenzie, then pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, an organization of charitable women who in compliment to their patron styled themselves the Doctor's Daughters. This organization gives temporary aid to persons in trouble and distress and helps them to help themselves. It takes care in exceptional cases of old and helpless men and women. It sends milk, groceries, meat, and coal where they are sadly needed, and it enlists the gratuitous service of physicians and surgeons in cases of special need. Its work along these lines has been continuous since its foundation and the good that it has done is beyond calculation. Its members give that best of all gifts, personal service. All the work of the society is done by its members and there are no "overhead" expenses. Every dollar placed in the hands of the society is used in the work it has in hand.

The Doctor's Daughters have only one source of income, namely, the charity of the public. It gives no entertainments and makes no attempt to combine fashion and revelry with beneficence. The annual expenses run between six and seven thousand dollars per year, all secured by voluntary gift.

The society has named October 25th, 26th, and 27th as donation days, appealing to the charitably disposed to make their gifts "as large as your heart dictates." Donations will be received at the White House and the City of Paris or checks may be made payable to The Doctor's Daughters and sent to Mrs. F. C. McCreary, 2020 Pacific Avenue, San Francisco.

The official roster of the Doctor's Daughters is as follows: President, Miss Suzanne McEwen; first vice-president, Miss Jennie M. Blair; second vice-president, Mrs. George B. Somers; recording secretary, Mrs. Fannie C. McCreary; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Robert C. Bolton; treasurer, Mrs. Charles Suydam; directors, Mrs. W. R. Sherwood, Mrs. W. D. Fennimore, Mrs. Alfred Tubbs, Mrs. Charles H. Crocker, Mrs. H. M. A. Miller.

THE SHAKESPEAREAN SEASON.

At the Berkeley Greek Theatre Under Direction of Professor Hume.

Lovers of the drama who have viewed with dismay the gradual destruction of the public taste by means of the moving picture and the hardly less pernicious influence of the commercially controlled theatre will welcome with something almost more than joy the Shakespearean performances which have been presented at the Greek Theatre in Berkeley during the last few weeks. The undertaking has been to present a group of Shakespeare's English plays, a group which in a way may be called a Falstaff Trilogy. "Henry IV," Parts I and II, have already been given and "The Merry Wives of Windsor" will be produced at the end of next week. It would be difficult to describe the two plays already given in terms too glowing. In these performances Professor Samuel J. Hume has given us not only something intrinsically fine, but he has given us a glimpse of the possibilities of the future. When Professor Hume came to Berkeley a year or so ago to take control of the Greek Theatre it was generally felt that as a community we would be richer by his exceptionally broad experience, but only in these recent Shakespearean productions have we realized what he can and will do for us. He has gathered together—from material for the most part close at hand—a group of artists, who under his inspiration are working brilliantly together. He has utilized the profound knowledge of color possessed by Professor Rudolph Schaeffer, head of the University School of Fine Arts, and the skill in designing of costumes possessed by his pupil, Mr. Norman Edwards, to produce a pictorial setting for his plays which compares favorably with the best work being done anywhere today. And one is not unmindful of Robert Edmund Jones.

The Greek Theatre itself has been treated in a new and strikingly decorative way. The acting of the plays, which after all is the thing even in these days of intensified joy in color and design, has been so good that the impression might well be of a very excellent professional company. To be sure, Mr. Gilmore Brown, the Falstaff (and, by the way, the only man in America to have acted that character in all three plays), is a man of considerable professional experience and the head of a very interesting Little Theatre in Pasadena. His characterization of the rôle is so perfect that one might almost think him the Falstaff that Shakespeare must have known. Professor Hume has done some excellent acting, and no account of the performances could be given without the mention of that brilliant, versatile young man, Irving Pichel, whose experience stretches from Harvard College to the Shubert management (which he left last year to joint Professor Hume in his Greek Theatre enterprise) and which sounds like a history of all that has been most interesting in the Little Theatre movement in America. But for the most part the players are local people. Many are high school or university students.

For the first time since its inception the Greek Theatre has become a living force with a definite policy and a plan for the future. Professor Hume has in prospect a long series of beautiful performances. In the spring there may be a series of Shakespeare's Italian plays, such as "Romeo and Juliet," "Merchant of Venice," and "Two Gentlemen of Verona." There are endless possibilities of new things, with of course repetitions at times, as all the properties have been made by and belong to the university. This includes the costumes so beautifully executed by Constance M. Randall.

All is not yet lost for the art of the theatre here in California if—and this is a most important if—the people living within the sphere of the university shall realize what beautiful and inspiring work is being done in their midst and support it to their utmost now in its beginning, when it is looking to them for its encouragement and its justification. MARY RODMAN PARKER.

An Unusual Exhibition at the Palace of Fine Arts.

An exhibition soon to open at the Palace of Fine Arts covers every important school of painting in Europe, including the Byzantine, from the fourteenth century down to and including the eighteenth-century French and English schools. It will contain over one hundred paintings, each representative of its particular artist, comprising notable examples of the great masters of the Italian, Spanish, Flemish, Dutch, German, English, and French schools.

The Italian school will include representative paintings by Tintoretto, Paolo Veronese, Angelo Allori Bronzino, Bernardino Luini, Jacopo Palma, Giovanni Francesco Penni, Alessandro Bonvicino Moretto, Lorenzo Lotto, Giulio Campi, and Canaletto.

The Spanish school will contain paintings by Francisco Goya, El Greco, Juan Carreño de Miranda, Sanchez Coello, and Francisco de Zurbarán.

The Flemish School—Pieter Paul Rubens, Anthony Van Dyck, Mahuse, Bernard Van Orley, Quintin Metsys, and Jan Van Hemessen among others.

Dutch School—Rembrandt, Ferdinand Bol, Elbert Cuyp, Jacob Ruisdael, Jan Wijnants, and Jan Davidz de Heem.

German School—Lucas Cranach the elder, Lucas Cranach the younger, Christoph Amberger, Hans Baldung, the Master of Frankfurt, and the Master of Lyvesberg Altar.

English School—Thomas Gainsborough, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir Thomas Lawrence, George Romney, John Constable, Joseph Mallord Turner, Richard Wilson, and John Crome.

French School—Jacques Louis David, Vigée LeBrun, Hyacinthe Rigaud, Louis Michel Van Loo, the Le Nain Brothers, Jean Baptiste Simeon Chardin, Jean Antoine Watteau, and Jean Baptiste Greuze.

In scope as well as in high quality of its exhibits, this exhibition of old masters is the most important ever shown outside of New York City.

The collection will be on exhibition for about four weeks. A carefully annotated and profusely illustrated catalogue is in preparation by the director. The exhibition is being sponsored by a committee of patrons and patronesses, public-spirited men and women, who are guaranteeing the very considerable expense involved in bringing the collection from New York to the Coast. As in the case of the Rembrandt and Zuloaga exhibitions, a small admission fee will be charged to help defray this expense.

Fortune-Telling Tea.

Deep down in our hearts, who amongst us has not at some time or other longed to draw aside the curtain and take a peek into the future. Perhaps this is why fortune-telling, in some form or other, has been practiced almost from time immemorial. Crystal-gazing, one form of prophesying the future, made its first appearance in India and from there spread to Europe. Palmistry originated with the gypsies and was used by them for years. The telling of fortunes by cards, of course, did not come into vogue until after the invention of print-

"Jack, this dinner was just wonderful, don't you think?"

"Glad you liked it."

"Doesn't that music make you want to dance?"

"I have it! We'll go up to the Sun Lounge. They have dancing there every Saturday evening."

"How lovely! Nothing can be more delightful. I like to dance in the Sun Lounge. I don't know why—Perhaps, it's the airy roof-garden atmosphere, the wonderful dancing floor, or the music, but the Sun Lounge is such a happy, joyous place to dance in."

"It's nearly nine. 'Come, or we'll miss the first dance.'"

ing. The Orientals have several ways of predicting the future. One of these is by tea leaves. The uninitiated see only a small heap of wet leaves, but to the seer each shape and size of the leaves, together with their position, reveals a romance, riches, travel, or adventure.

At the "Fortune-Telling Tea," next Tuesday afternoon, October 12th, in the picturesque Sun Lounge, the Hotel Whitcomb will have a gifted fortune-teller present to read the future for its guests by means of tea leaves. This is a wonderful opportunity to get acquainted with this charming custom, which is in itself a most fascinating and entertaining pastime.

Bridge-Tea.

The Hotel Whitcomb entertained on Tuesday afternoon with a bridge-tea. A bridge instructor coached new players and outlined the games during the afternoon. The score prize was won by Mr. J. G. Borck. This was the second of a series of afternoon affairs which the Hotel Whitcomb has planned for the season.

A Painful Incident.

Of course the President in his contention with Senator Spencer has not purposely misstated facts. But Mr. Wilson has a notably short memory and a mind which even in normal health by his own confession operates on a single track. His inadvertences are many. And when he forgets or speaks without reflection he is apt to lose his poise and to spit out things which afterwards call for retraction, for explanation, even for remorse. Then Mr. Wilson is a sick man, under the spell of a distemper whose effects tend to deteriorated mentality. Propriety and pity for infirmity suggest that the mantle of charity be cast over the charge of falsehood that Mr. Wilson has made against Mr. Spencer.

The President's guardians would do well to viser his outgivings more closely. It goes without saying that he should not have been permitted to indulge the vulgar impulse to accuse Mr. Spencer of lying; and he should further have been protected against the stupidity of supporting the charge by a dubious stenographic record that gains nothing from the questionable assumption of "official" character and which under analysis tends to support rather than embarrass Mr. Spencer. Somewhere there must exist an authoritative record of the assurances given by the President in the eighth plenary session of the peace conference. And, assuredly, this record will be searched out and made public. So serious a charge will not be permitted to pass without full exposition of the truth. The evidence of a stenographer without official status will not be accepted as a basis for "closing the incident." Mr. Spencer, whose integrity has been challenged, will not have it so. Mr. Wilson ought not to demand it. The matter is too serious to be regarded as closed while there remain the doubts associated with conflicting testimony. In the meantime the public in charity should remember that Mr. Wilson is a sick man, subject to overexhilarated moods, likewise subject to errors that flow from the habit of thinking in phrases.

Proposition Twelve.

In the long list of matters to be determined by popular vote in the coming election there is a proposal to place in the Constitution of the state a fixed imposition of $.0012 on each dollar of assessed property, the moneys collected therefrom to go into a special fund for support of the State University. Many arguments are presented in urgency of this proposal. Summed up and boiled down they amount to just this—the university wants the money. Here we pause to say that the Argonaut concedes to nobody a more positive interest in the welfare of the university or a greater willingness to supply whatever may be essential to the proper prosecution of its work. After the fundamental requirements of social order, public defense, community charity, and primary education, none other of the functions assumed by the state makes higher appeal than that of higher education. From the earliest days of our statehood its importance has been universally conceded, and it has been supported with a consistency and a generosity not surpassed, if indeed matched, in any other American commonwealth. The magnificent establishment at Berkeley and the expanding roster of its beneficiaries bear witness to the liberality of a state which from its beginnings has appreciated the value of liberal knowledge and made generous provision for its diffusion.

None the less there are objections to the proposal now before the people of California grounded upon principles of enduring authority, principles which above all ought not to be thrust aside in favor of an agency whose first and best product should be respect for fundamentals in the ordering of society. First, detailed provision for support of any state institution has no proper place in the State Constitution. Nothing should be put into a Constitution that is properly subject under pressure of times and occasions to varying considerations of expediency. There are occasions—as now—when the state may and should bestow upon the university exceptional grants of money. There are other occasions when the state must in prudence put limits upon its generosity—as, for illustration, the period immediately following the disaster of 1906. Important as the work of the university is, it would be a mistake to give it a fixed and perpetual mortgage in times good and times bad upon the resource of the state. The university has no moral right to a status so exceptional as to establish it above the vicissitudes of time and circumstance.

Support of the university is but one of many functions assumed by the state. And if there should be imposed in its behalf a fixed charge upon property, then every other state institution could—and would—demand an equally privileged status. The list of functions and institutions that might be expected to make similar appeal is too long for enumeration. It would include every institution, subject, or agency to which the state is a contributor, and the demand would be impossible of denial excepting by a plea impossible of logical justification. If the bar of restraining principle shall be let down in the interest of the university, then it must be held down in behalf of a hundred other interests. When once the limitation of sound rule is abandoned it is in effect to open flood gates difficult or impossible ever to shut down.

It is desired, say the advocates of the proposed amendment, to make the university "independent." From the standpoint of university administration—unhappily not always practical in its aims or methods—this would be a mighty fine thing. But ought the university, or ought any institution drawing its support from the public, to be independent in the sense of standing exempt from public regulation and control? Ought the people of California to be taxed in support of an institution so loftily placed as to be a law unto itself? Specialists in any sphere, more particularly in the sphere of education, are wont to be under the spell of theory, subject to motives little related to the work-a-day world. And is it right to saddle the work-a-day world with an obligation to support an institution that may ride at any pace it may choose in wisdom or in folly? Is it in keeping with the spirit of the American system that there shall be in the institutions of the state a privileged member or caste, drawing the sources of its life from the public, yet not answerable to the public judgment and will? To these queries there is but one answer—No! Appreciating as it does the values that abide in higher education, understanding as it does the importance of the university in its relations to the welfare of California, generous as it wishes the state to be in support of the university to which it is affectionately attached, the Argonaut protests against a proposal that seeks to break down a fundamental rule in government and that would place a publicly-supported institution above stimulative or corrective authority.

It is true that there are annoyances, even embarrassments, in the system under which the university must appeal biennially to the state legislature. It would indeed be "nice" if Berkeley might be free from Sacramento. None the less we suspect that in the long run it will be better both for the university and for the state if Berkeley shall remain in dependence upon Sacramento. No institution of the state has a moral right to independence; and independence, we believe, would tend in the course of years to disadvantage rather than to benefit. There has never been a time when Sacramento, representing as it does the corporate will of the state, has not with a reasonable generosity responded to the appeals of Berkeley; and there never will be so long as the university in its policies and products reflects and answers the public demands upon it and so long as means are available. Surely nobody can wish that even the university should be so placed as to defy public judgment of its usefulness or to command that which the state can not afford to provide.

That the means at the disposal of the regents of the university are not at the present time adequate to the requirements of the system as it is established at Berkeley, every intelligent observer knows. There is need for more house room, for increased appliances, for purchase and care of books, for research, above all for increased salaries of professors. It is neither right nor expedient that unskilled labor should bring a larger reward than the accomplishments and exertions of scholarship. There ought to be, and there must be, immediate enlargement of the resources of the university, but such enlargement should come through processes not inconsistent with fundamental proprieties and principles. We venture to ask is it not possible that some measure of relief might come through readjustments at Berkeley? Has not the system there in some respects run away with itself—gone beyond the requirements of necessity and propriety? Frankly, the Argonaut believes that there is need of reforms that would make for good all round. It the curriculum been so widened as to include much that is non-essential, much that is ornamental, much that makes for entertainment rather than for service? We venture the suggestion that it is no proper function of the university, more particularly of a university drawing its support from the public, to maintain at least some of the courses established at Berkeley. Our sensational newspapers, let it be admitted, may not fairly be taken as truthful exponents of university life, or of anything else. Yet we get in them from time to time reflections of policies, courses, and events at Berkeley far from edifying. Too many incidents, duly portrayed pictorially in the daily press, are illustrative of things which ought not to be associated with the university. Perhaps something could be gained for the serious work and more vital obligations of the university by lopping off things non-essential or mischievous.

Campaign Side-Lights.

That there is a profound breach between President Wilson and candidate Cox is revealed by many circumstances. Its beginnings were in the refusal of the San Francisco convention to take programme from the White House, resulting in a nomination to which Wilson would never have given consent. It was later aggravated by Cox's deposition of Homer Cummings, the President's man in the chairmanship of the national committee, implying a break-away from Wilsonian dictation. Still more recently the presidential resentment was fanned into a fierce flame by Cox's criticism of Secretaries Palmer and Burleson, this being, according to the Wilsonian mind, nothing less grievous than an assault upon the whole Wilson régime. In an effort to smooth matters over Cox last week sent his personal representative, E. H. Moore, to Washington for a conference with the President. Moore spent three days seeking for an audience, but got no further than Secretary Tumulty's office. Finally he was told in a message straight from the sanctum that the President felt outraged over what Cox had said about Palmer and Burleson, and that he interpreted the criticism as personal to himself and his administration. Moore was told that if Cox wanted Wilson's support he would have to come in person and ask for it, and that furthermore he would be required to explain certain matters.

In the meantime Barney Baruch and others who have access to the President put before him the desperate plight of the campaign, laying special stress upon the effect on the Wilsonian prestige if the Versailles covenant should go down to defeat. Thus, under pressure of his personal interest, the President finally mastered his antipathy to Cox to the extent of putting forth the statement that appeared in the press of the country last week. It is to be noted that this statement ignores the candidates and directs its argument exclusively to the league of nations. Other statements are promised, and it is possible that the President may succeed in so far suppressing his rage against Cox as to make personal appeal in his behalf. But it is to be doubted. Wilson has always resented any criticism of himself, of his agents, of anything that he or they have done; and his propensities in this respect have not been softened by illness and the state of mind it has produced. He wants Cox to win the election because Democratic success would sustain the fight for the league of nations; but if there were any path to this consummation that would not include advantage to Cox he would undoubtedly take it.

In truth, the league of nations is about the only issue left upon which Cox has a chance of success. All his efforts to create other issues have failed. First he tried to make scandal of the methods of the Republican Campaign Committee, with the effect of injuring his own cause. He next tried by criticism of Secretaries Palmer and Burleson to divorce himself from the taint of Wilsonism, and that failed. His friends have impressed upon him that he is beaten unless a new angle can be given to the campaign, and the only diversion possible is toward the league of nations. Only by rallying the pro-leaguers is there even a possibility of changing the conditions of the campaign; furthermore, only by rallying the pro-leaguers can campaign funds be obtained. Summarized, active Wilson support can in any way add to the discomfiture under which Cox labors, whereas it is just possible that active support for the league issue might help. Therefore from now on the personality of the candidate is to be submerged. The party management will play up the league and play down Cox.

How strongly the President feels about the league is made evident, not more by the smothering of his animosity against Cox than by the vehemence of his first campaign statement. He is amazed at the "gross ignorance" and "impudent audacity" of those who question his interpretation of Article 10. Thus it appears that he is still actuated by the passions that were in evidence upon his first return from Paris, and that he has not been able to so master his feelings as to make reference to the matter in moderate and respectful terms. In the charges of "gross ignorance" and "impudent audacity" there is manifest the same intolerance of mind that voiced itself in the hateful phrases of "narrow vision" and "pigmy minds."

Of course, the President is now speaking only to the American audience. But to be logical he should extend the scope of his "amazement" to include several European statesmen of note who, by the same reasoning, must lie under the charge of "gross ignorance and impudent audacity." No less than half a score of the leading statesmen of Europe, including Mr. Lloyd George, President Millerand, and others, have not hesitated to put interpretations of their own on various clauses of the covenant, which interpretations are far from being in accord with those of the President. For example, he has repeatedly declared that the covenant is not in conflict with the Monroe Doctrine. A quite contrary opinion is held by certain British statesmen, who maintain that if any dispute shall ever arise "the league is there to determine it." It is pretty well settled in law that one party to a contract has not the right to put his own interpretation upon its language. In the case of the covenant there are many parties to the contract. Is it not reasonable to assume that in the event of dispute over interpretations of the various clauses of the contract the league itself is to do the final interpreting? Is it not probable that it might interpret the contract in a way that President Wilson has stigmatized as implying "gross ignorance" and "impudent audacity"?

On the other side of the campaign we find Senator Borah following the same tactics in his independent and uncontrolled campaign. And here it is pertinent to remark that Borah is, and has all along been, the inspiring mind in the radical anti-league campaign. Mr. Johnson, Mr. Reed, and others have done more talking, but the fountainhead of the movement worked out through them has been in the senator from Idaho. Borah, it is evident, loves Harding little more than Wilson loves Cox. Thus Wilson and Borah are working to the same purpose, that of thrusting aside and postponing other issues and of placing the whole emphasis of the campaign, so far as it may be done, upon the "solemn referendum." More power to all of them! Let us have an expression from the people, just as we had it in the congressional elections of 1918. We have no fear as to the result. The matter is now before the country in all its bearings. The issue is as well understood as any issue ever can be in a country where the conditions are so extended and diverse. It may be that a majority of the people are willing to surrender some part of our sovereignty to an alien council. It may be that a majority of our people are willing to send our youth to fight in foreign quarrels and to spend our means in contentions in which we can have neither knowledge nor interest. The Argonaut does not believe it. But since there are those who do, by all means let the determination be made.

The Issue of the Hour.

Constructive Republican policies after victory are even more important than victory itself. It will matter little that Mr. Harding shall be President if in the presidency he shall not have the support of those who will coöperate with him in reorganizing the government. Today the Republicans have a majority of one in the Senate, if we count La Follette of Wisconsin and reckon upon the continued support of several senators of questionable party loyalty. Those who know the conditions realize the necessity, if Mr. Harding is not to be balked in the purposes implied in his election, of increasing the Republican membership. California is now misrepresented by a Democratic senator. This ought not to be either in good faith or in discretion.

California, a Republican state, committed by varied pledges to support of Republican policies, owes it to her interest and her integrity to support the President-to-be with a Republican senator in the place of Mr. Phelan. All the considerations of time and circumstance support the candidacy of Mr. Shortridge. His loyalty as a Republican is beyond question; his support of Republican measures is an assurance. Failure to elect Mr. Shortridge may result in giving the Senate to the Democrats and of placing it as an obstruction to Republican projects looking to reorganization of the government, with return to constitutionalism as against autocracy in the administration of government.

Prohibition and Disloyalty to Law.

Prohibition we were told was to give us, if not a new Heaven, at least a new earth. It was to make the world sober and per consequence virtuous. It was to empty the jails and to close the asylums. It was to reduce the necessity for and the cost of courts. It was to make the policeman an anachronism. It was to cut down taxes to all but the vanishing point. It was to establish the reign of the good, the true, and the beautiful.

Up to date results have failed to justify the brag. Has anybody observed a reign of sobriety and surcease of crime? Has anybody noted that our jails are closed or our asylums empty? Are we dreaming, or in reality do we read that there is demand for more courts, for more policemen, for more taxes? Is it truth or delusion that we fail to see the good, the true, and the beautiful dominating man and all his doings and that traces of the devil's handiwork are all about?

Apparently there was miscue in the vision of those who were to regenerate the world through prohibition. Apparently they failed to reckon with propensities, habits, and inter-play of interests and resentments. They had their way in the making of a law that conflicts with dispositions inherent in human nature. Now they ought to be able to see that instead of bettering social conditions they have made them worse. Not even the many delinquencies that flowed from the abuses of license measure as one in five to the crimes large and small incidental to the futile law of prohibition. By aiming at too much the reformers have harmed rather than helped the cause of temperance and morality. If there be doubters, let them give their attention day by day to the record of results as they are spread in the newspaper press of the country.

Verily we are becoming a nation of petty criminals. Multitudes formerly strict observers of law have lost respect for law and are void of conscience in defiance of its mandate. Men—and women—who find in the law restrictions upon propensity, habit, and judgment, restrictions without justification in morals, restrictions at odds with accepted standards of individual liberty, regard the law contemptuously and make no scruple of evading it. Thus loyalty to law, loyalty to government which has made the law, loyalty to the morality which rests upon obedience to law, is lost. All of which bodes no good to a system in which law is the presumptive sovereign.

Judicial Salaries.

Among the proposed constitutional amendments to be voted on at the coming election is one increasing the yearly salaries of the justices of the Supreme Court from $8000 to $10,000 and those of the justices of the District Courts of Appeal from $7000 to $9000. These courts, with altogether twenty-two judges, transact all of the appellate business of this state, now the eighth state of the Union in population, together with a great volume of most important business which comes to them in view of the original jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution. It is unnecessary to say anything as to the importance of the duties of these courts or as to the desirability of giving to the judges a fair compensation. The simple facts with relation to the proposed amendment are that the present salaries were fixed in 1906; that at the time they were fixed they were regarded as only moderate compensation for members of the highest courts of the state; that these salaries have been reduced in purchasing power to less than one-half of their former value; and that whatever reduction in prices may come within the next few years no one can hope that it will be so great as to fully restore the old purchasing power or to make the salaries, even with the proposed 25 per cent. increase, equal to those of 1906. No one who gives the matter consideration in the light of these facts can have any doubt as to his duty in the matter. The proposed amendment, which is Proposition No. 3 on the ballot, should receive the support of all who believe in the maintenance of an independent and efficient judiciary.

Editorial Notes.

Mr. Clarence Wooster of this city, who has had repeated and close personal contacts with President Obregon of Mexico, discredits reports describing him (Obregon) as of limited knowledge and experience and as speaking only the Spanish language. Obregon, Mr. Wooster says, had traveled widely in the United States previous to his visit here two years ago. He speaks English freely, and so far from being a man of narrow and provincial views, is broadly intelligent with respect to the affairs of the world. All this is much to the good. It will be easier to carry on our diplomatic and other exchanges with a man of intelligence who understands the English language than with the typical Mexican whose mental horizon is limited by the boundaries of Mexico. It is due, no doubt, to the Indian in his blood that leads Obregon in his dealings with American and other foreign diplomats to speak through interpreters. He will no doubt drop this affectation when it shall snit his diplomacy, as it surely will when it comes to close dealing.

It is to be said of Obregon's administration that it begins well. Heads of the various branches of the administration appear to have been chosen discreetly. Several are citizens of Sonora, where they had long been in close contact with Americans and therefore are better qualified than the typical Mexican for intercourse with the American and other governments. Obregon's chief and most immediate problem is to get rid of his three or four hundred "generals," who hang like leeches upon the government, without so offending them as to promote military rebellion. If he can rid himself of the incubus of his military entourage, and at the same time establish a tolerable social order, he will no doubt be able to raise in this country the means absolutely necessary to governmental and industrial rehabilitation.

There would be greater hope of Obregon's success if the Mexican political record, remote and recent, tended more to confidence. In the ninety-nine years that have elapsed since Mexico cast off the Spanish yoke there have been, including Obregon's, seventy-four distinct governments in the country. With the exception of the period of the Diaz administration, Mexican revolutions have averaged more than one per year. Thus the habit of the country is to overturn its government whenever it ceases to be strong enough in a military sense to maintain its hold upon the administrative machinery. Mexico always has been, and must long be, subject to military domination. Peaceful methods are futile in a country where practically everybody is spoiling for a fight. Obregon, as a military man of high prestige, has an obvious advantage; none the less his besetments are many. On the whole it may be said that the chances are against him.

Very obviously the means Obregon so sadly needs can only be found here. No European country has the money even if it had the will; and Japan is out of the question. In the immediate posture of affairs—probably, under any posture of affairs—the Washington government would veto any proposal under which Japan might obtain a financial hold upon Mexico. Practically Mexico's only chance of aid in the form of capital is with us; and it will be the part of wisdom if we shall deal less in remembrance of past grievances than in hope of better things to come. Mexico must have help and it is up to us to supply it—of course under guarantees.

A number of hitherto unpublished letters from Mathew Arnold, Thomas Hardy, George Cruikshank, Du Maurier, Rossetti, Walt Whitman, Robert Browning, and Thackeray have been included in "Frederick Locker-Lampson," a character sketch which the Scribners have just brought out. Locker-Lampson is little known in this country except possibly as a collector, the Rowfant Club in Cleveland being named after his own library. Notes on some of his rarest and most interesting books are included in this volume.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

President Obregon of Mexico.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 12, 1920.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In last week's Argonaut is an editorial concerning Mr. Obregon, president-elect of Mexico, in which it is said that until two years ago he was largely ignorant of everything outside of Mexico and that until 1918 he was never in the United States.

Mr. Clarence E. Wooster, whom you know of course, owns, or did own a few years ago, a large ranch in Hermosillo, and he was then in that state for a considerable period of time. He tells me he had some important business transactions with Obregon and became well acquainted with him, and that he then learned from his conversation that he, Obregon, had traveled extensively in the United States and was well informed regarding it. This was some ten years ago. He says Obregon speaks English fluently and impressed him as being a man of affairs and much ability.

Either Mr. Wooster or your informant must be very much mistaken.
Sincerely yours,
LUCIEN SHAW.

The Issue of the Hour.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 12, 1920.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: If Harding should be elected President, as now seems certain, without a substantial increase over the present Republican majority of two in the United States Senate, it will prove a clog so serious that it can not fail to impede and retard, and might even block legislation vitally necessary to the restoration of the country to a sane and normal basis.

To elect Senator Harding and at the same time refuse to the Republican party a safe working majority in the Senate would be the almost exact equivalent to embarking all of your worldly goods in a great ship in which you were part owner and then to demand that its guidance in a dangerous storm be entrusted to a helmsman crippled by the loss of an arm.

It is for this reason that the choosing of Republican successors to the Democratic senators who come up for reelection this year assumes an importance but second only (and only slightly second) to the presidential election itself.

After the seven and a half years of wanton waste, self-satisfied incompetence, and irresponsible extravagance which Democratic administration has treated the country to and to which it has added continued substitution of the service of the lip for either executive or legislative action; of the promise of empty if high-sounding and specious words for performance, the voters, no matter what their personal feelings towards individual candidates, can not afford the risk of leaving the Democrats in a position to menace Republican legislation.

This senatorial election holds a peculiar and special interest for the voters in California, in that Mr. Phelan both in his recorded votes and in the theories and policies of government of the party to which he belongs, and which he advocates and upholds, not only stands for everything that is contrary to the best interests of the state, but seeks to camouflage his legislative shortcomings and heliefs with the slogan, "Keep California White."

Mr. Phelan's "Keep California White" is but a legislatively posthumous outcry, since it can now only be made effective by Republican legislative action. For four of the almost six years that Mr. Phelan has been senator from California the President, the Senate, and the House were all three Democratic. "Keep California White" was then not only legislatively possible, but probable if Mr. Phelan has properly introduced anti-Japanese legislation and then advocated it with sufficient of eloquence and the intelligent presentation of compelling facts. The need for it was as great then as now, save only for the small question of Mr. Phelan's reelection. Mr. Phelan, however, kept silent and even had to await membership on the Emigration Committee until the Republicans regained control of the Senate.

On the question of the league of nations, with one exception, Mr. Phelan voted to reject the so-called Lodge reservations. In the last vote of all in the long fight to Americanize the league Mr. Phelan voted for the Underwood resolution of ratification, which would have accepted the treaty without change.

Free trade is the official policy of the Democratic party, and while not a member of the Senate when it was enacted, Mr. Phelan endorses and approves the Wilson tariff that the Democrats put into effect on March 1, 1914, a tariff that hears heavily and directly against the interests of California.

This tariff, among other things, reduced the duties on olive oil from 50 to 30 cents a gallon; whale oil, from 8 to 5 cents per gallon; horses and mules and all live animals not specially provided for, from 20-25 per cent to 10 per cent ad valorem; barley, from 30 to 15 cents a bushel; cleaned rice, from 2 to 1 cent a pound; hay, from $4 to $2 a ton; apples, peaches, quinces, cherries, plums, and pears, from 25 cents to 10 cents a bushel; certain preserved fruits, from 2 to 1 cent a pound; lemons, from 1½ cents to half a cent a pound. The tariff on wool, which California produces, it reduced; that on tobacco and cotton, which California consumes, it either retained or advanced.

From the waters of its streams and from its reluctant hills "the Argonauts" drew the precious metal that first gave to California the name of "the Golden State," a name that development of its wondrous agricultural resources was to perpetuate and make permanent. So universal is the demand that no man or political party can hold an exclusive brief for "Keep California White." If it could come to that, indeed, the Republican party made Chinese exclusion the law of the land almost before Mr. Phelan had time to cast his first vote. The Republican party can far more safely be entrusted to extend this exclusion to the Japanese than can Mr. Phelan and the Democratic party, who and which advocates the erection of a super-state and the possible, even probable, remission to alien decision and control of our foreign policy, our political freedom, and our economic future.

You can "Keep California White" and yet not "Keep California Golden," but you can not "Keep California Golden" and not "Keep California White."

"Keep California White" means both the exclusion of the Japanese and that the Japanese shall not own, control, or in any way exploit the lands of California. "Keep California White" means that we will not and can not compete with the Japanese in the natural domestic markets of California with the product of California lands that are now owned or controlled by Japanese.

"Keep California Golden" means all this and more. It means as well that we will not and can not compete in the natural domestic markets of California with the products of Japan itself, except and unless a protective tariff adds to the cost of these Japanese products the difference due to the lower wage and inferior scale of living in Japan. By not offsetting these differences the Wilson tariff of 1914 favors Japan. This argument applies in greater or less degree to all countries in which the scales of living and wage are lower than ours and whose products the Wilson tariff permits to compete in its domestic markets with the products of the United States.

You must "Keep California White" if you would "Keep California Golden." The way to insure the one and to make certain the other will be for California to uphold the hands of Warren G. Harding as President by sending Samuel M. Shortridge to the United States Senate.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

AWAKENING ASIA.

By L. Dumont-Wilden in "Revue Bleue."

While Europe is futilely groping toward its own recovery, the immense population of Asia, hitherto considered merely material for exploitation, has begun to move and agitate. Quite possibly this awakening will occasion in the near future the most serious and terrible political problem which the coming generation will have to face. The landing of the Bolsheviks in Persia, the advance of Lenin's troops toward Teheran, have obviously overthrown all the theories upon which England's plans were based. Every one realizes that Lloyd George's reversal of policy and recent friendliness toward the Soviet government are inspired by his fear that Bolshevism will sweep over Asia. It is far from certain, even if we look at the case solely from an English viewpoint, that he took a wise course. Bolshevism is assuming increasingly the aspect of a religion, and like all conquering religions, it will sacrifice everything for propaganda. Therefore it will win a decisive victory if it wins the recognition of a great Western power, and thus opens a channel for spreading its doctrines over Europe. But it is no less true that the fears felt by the English premier are fully justified.

All European powers are threatened by Oriental Bolshevism. But it is England which holds the outposts. That is the country which represents in the eyes of all Asiatics a conquering and exploiting Europe; that is the government which they hope and conspire to ruin and expel. Unhappily, whether we will it or not, and innocent as we may be of complicity in the policy of conquest which inspires this revolt, our fortunes are united with those of our allies. Asiatic Bolshevism seeks first to expel the English, and then all other Occidentals.

It was a master stroke, a manœuvre of genius, for Lenin, when his propaganda was checked in the Occident, to conceive the gigantic plan of employing for his ends Russia's historical function of intermediary between Europe and Asia and of accommodating his chimerical internationalism with that mystical nationalism which unites all the peoples of the Orient in common distrust and dislike of the rule of "European capitalism."

In some of its aspects Bolshevism is well designed to suit Asiatic tastes. Communism is an ancient ideal of the nomad peoples, who can adjust themselves to it far better than sedentary and agricultural nations. The disorder and anarchy which in our eyes are the greatest evils of the Soviet government have been for centuries the normal condition in those ancient homes of nominal despotism. Turks, Arabs, Turanians, Afghans, Persians, and the peoples of the Caucasus, have but a vague and shadowy idea of the state, and we must confess that such a knowledge as they may have derived from their dealings with Western states is not likely to make them love that ideal. But the Bolshevik state, which is a state reduced to atoms, suits their customs and social institutions.

On the other hand, however, Asiatics instinctively rejected Lenin's internationalist doctrines. Lacking consciousness of the state, these people have an over-emphasized consciousness of race and of tribal solidarity. It is solely a desire to liberate their race, their tribe, their religion from the domination of all "Western barbarians" which inspires them to try the venture of a grand revolt against powers which they have hitherto considered irresistible, and of which they now perceive the weakness.

Lenin understands this perfectly. The propagandists whom he sent to Constantinople, Syria, Persia, Asia Minor, and British India have confined themselves to preaching a special phase of national self-determination. Throughout all these regions Bolshevism means to the common people one thing: fight Europe and fight the West.

There has been no more typical illustration of this than the pretended Bolshevik revolution in Baku. At first the shifting of equilibrium in Transcaucasia was supposed to be in favor of Moscow. The truth is that the Tartars of Azerbaijan merely used the Soviet formula to emphasize their break with Europe. They found the Russian word convenient to designate their solidarity with the Turkish nationalists in Anatolia, with whom they are united by racial bonds. Reports coming independently from different sources, fragmentary though they be, all go to show that the object of this movement, and the goal which it seeks, is the erection in Transcaucasia of a great Mussulman state, to be a satellite of Turkey, with territories extending from the Caspian Sea to the vicinity of Kars and Erzerum—a state essentially anti-European.

That is far indeed from being a Bolshevik idea; but it does not preclude the possibility, and indeed probability, that Lenin really instigated the overthrow in Baku; for Bolshevik policy in the Orient has adopted all the traditions of Asiatic Machiavellism. That is at man at Moscow was dreaming of one thing only; to create the greatest possible embarrassment for the Western nations.

Like all founders of religions, Lenin is perfectly capable of employing very practical opportunism in the service of his dreams. It matters little to him that Azerbaijan will ally itself with Turkish nationalism rather than with Russian Sovietism. For the time being the main thing is to multiply universal disorder, that a new order may be born. Asia is at the present moment a centre of disorder and a focus of anarchy; Asiatic passions are an additional resource in his hands. Everything brings grain to his mill: the loyalty of the Anatolian peasant toward his padishah, the hopes of the Arabians embodied in an Emir Faysal, and the bitterness of the educated Mussulmen of Damascus and Cairo, eager to revenge themselves for the manifold humiliations they have suffered from the West.

Albeit nationalism, rendered more ardent by its wounded pride, inspires all the peoples of ancient Turkey, there is in every one of them a radical-extremist group, constituting a powerful minority. Undoubtedly the Turkish nationalists, and their leader, Mustapha Kemal, still hesitate to commit themselves fully to a Bolshevik Asia, and cling as yet to the declarations of the Congress of Sivas, which are limited to asserting the integrity of national Turkish territory within the limits occupied by the Turks at the date of the armistice. They are fighting for a single thing: the independence of their fatherland. But they, too, are willing to employ any reinforcements which offer. The Bolsheviks in their own country, as well as the Arab, Egyptian, or Hindoo proselytes to this belief, offer that reinforcement; and these radicals, animated as they are by an extremity of passion, utilize the ardor of the conflict to lead a more conservative element further than they intended.

Upon this Lenin bases his hope. The list of lands where Mohammedan Bolshevism has active propagandists continues to extend. They embrace Siberia, Russian Turkestan, Chinese Turkestan, Afghanistan, Bokhara, Khiva, Persia, Caucasus, India, Thrace, Anatolia, Syria, Albania, Egypt, Arabia, and even to some extent Algiers, Tunis, and Morocco. The centre of the movement is in Tashkent, in Turkestan, where Enver Pasha, his heart bursting with hatred, is laboring hand in hand with the delegates of the Soviets. That is where plans are being worked out for a general confederation of the Mussulman peoples. Turkish politicians and generals, whose fortunes were ruined by the war, Muscovite anarchists, Persian nationalists exasperated by the English treaty, Oriental adventurers of every race are carrying thither their passions and intrigues. A Mussulman and revolutionary mysticism is being developed, which is captivating even the minds of the young intellectuals of Damascus and Beirut, men who have been educated in our own schools and speak French and English with admirable correctness—men who seem almost like ourselves, but remain in the depths of their hearts true sons of the Prophet.

From one end to the other of the Oriental world imaginations are at work. We may fancy that these people have been finally subjugated by our force and prestige; but time does not count with the children of these ancient lands. What do a few years, or even a few centuries, mean for a continent which has seen Babylon, Nineveh, Elam, and Bagdad pass away? Even while witnessing the decadence of Islam, these people have always believed that their day of vengeance would come. Now they think it has arrived, or is about to dawn.

Possibly the most disquieting aspect of this situation is the extension of the movement in India. There, too, the emissaries of Mussulman Bolshevism have started their propaganda. We have already seen what profound discontent the threat of depriving the Sultan of Constantinople caused among the Mohammedan Hindoos. The English occupation of their sacred city has added to their irritation.

Of course, England still has ample military forces to hold these vast territories, even though revolts may break out at isolated points. But the officers who are returning from these regions are not overconfident. The native army is unreliable. The common soldiers, and above all, the officers of Hindoo blood do not show the same respect for their English superiors as heretofore. It is becoming increasingly difficult to enlist English troops to serve in India. Before the war there were plenty of recruits. Soldiers liked the prestige which they enjoyed in India; and the promise of an easy billet attracted many to the service. But as an officer just returning from Bombay recently said: "The situation has changed entirely since the new labor legislation in Great Britain. Men now work less in Manchester factories and earn more than they do in the Indian regiments. We can not keep our quotas filled; furthermore, the troops already out there have no hope to being relieved, because the new recruits at home are being sent to Ireland or to Egypt." Let us admit that Downing Street has reason to be seriously worried. That is the first indication of the progress of Bolshevism in the Mohammedan-Asiatic world, which is already distracting the attention of England from the Rhine.

Still farther east the problem assumes a different aspect. Lenin may have employed many Chinese mercenaries in his red guard, but we have no evidence that his doctrines have made serious inroads into the yellow world. Nevertheless the latter is agitated by an anti-European movement with a more distant objective, but an equally dangerous intent. There, likewise, the battle cry, "Asia for the Asiatics," has turned every one's head. But this movement dates further back. The Boxer revolt in 1900 was an explosive manifestation of hatred of the white race, which has been repressed, but never extinguished. Since that time Chinese capitalists have been buying up little by little many European enterprises, and if for the moment national sentiment is more anti-Japanese than anti-white, we should not delude ourselves with the idea that we are loved. The scornful treatment which the Chinese delegates received at the peace conference, where their claims to Kaiochow did not even receive a hearing, has embittered public sentiment in their country, and that indignation is equally strong in the north and in the south. The educated youth of China who started the revolution, and who have adopted our ideas with a literalness that is at the same time juvenile and Oriental, are eagerly awaiting an opportunity to disembarrass their republic of all the restraints upon its sovereignty which our enterprises in the Far East represent. Happily for us, this purpose is for the moment secondary. The immediate enemy is Japan, which has seized Shantung by main force.

Apparently the Japanese are ambitious to play the same part in the yellow world that Prussia played during the nineteenth century in the Germanic world. Up to the present China shows no disposition to permit these pretensions, and the empire of the Mikados has not found a Bismarck competent to arouse and concentrate the hatred of the yellow race against the white race in the way the great Prussian chancellor aroused and concentrated the hatred of Germany against France. But what may happen tomorrow? Hitherto Japanese imperialism has been inspired by the narrowest egoism. However, a change is always possible. Perhaps that country will see the light, and understand that a more generous and liberal policy in relation to Kiaochow may win the favor of China, and enable Japan to enjoy still greater advantage as guide and counselor to that still unstable and troubled country.

Certainly, though, this moment has not yet arrived. For the time being Tokyo seems intent upon an even more definitely aggressive policy than heretofore, as we have evidence in Siberia.

Japanese penetration of that country commenced in 1918, when two cruisers anchored in the Bay of Vladivostok. It is true that they were accompanied by French, English, and American vessels. Their rôle was to be limited to protecting the Allied residents and preventing the military supplies accumulated at that port from falling into the hands of the Bolsheviks. But it soon became evident that the Japanese had other designs. Seven months later, when troops were landed, their contingent was far the largest. It was speedily reinforced, and on the pretext of protecting the railway, it advanced as far as Irkutsk. There was no obvious reason for this, but the most plausible pretext was to protect the anti-Bolsheviks. Admiral Kolchak, at first victorious and later defeated, always enjoyed the favor of Tokyo; but in such a way that one never was quite certain whether the government there was better pleased by his defeats or by his victories.

When Kolchak was eliminated and the English, French, Americans, and Czecho-Slovaks were returned to their own countries, the Japanese were the only ones left in eastern Siberia. At once their policy became more brutal, their armies more numerous, their occupation more effective. It is evident to the whole world that we are face to face with a vast Japanese imperialist and military operation. That country has taken advantage of Russia's collapse to seize what European opposition prevented its obtaining at the Portsmouth peace negotiations.

Are we dealing here with a direct and permanent occupation—a true conquest? That is hardly probable. Japan is, as a matter of fact, not strong enough to embark on such an adventure. Its domestic situation is precarious. A social movement which may become dangerous is making itself felt. The Shantung matter is not adjusted. Korea is in constant revolt. The United States, adding rapidly to its powerful fleet, regards with distrust every threat of Japanese expansion. But then, what does the military and political policy of Japan in Siberia mean?

The plan is merely to create a buffer state for the present between Japan and Bolshevik Siberia. This buffer state is to embrace the territories which Japan is unable to assimilate either politically or economically, but which it can keep under its indirect control, even though Russia should recover and again become a member of the community of European nations.

So we have Asia adopting a new attitude toward Europe. In fact, all of those who have lived long in the Orient have heard rumors of the existence of a secret society, of whom a large number of Japanese and Chinese statesmen are members, the purpose of which is to keep "Asia for the Asiatics." Among our countrymen residing in the Orient are many thinking men who know the yellow world well. These are accustomed to say sadly that within possibly a few decades it may become difficult, if not impossible, for us French, English, and Hollanders to retain control of colonies among people who will hardly deign to accept the status of dominions.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Dr. Maxime Leuret, a Swiss, is in America on a walk around the world, during which he earns his own way. Since his start in 1914 he has worn out 102 pairs of shoes.

Albert Rose, a dockyard worker in Chatham, England, has retired after fifty-six years' service. Rose claims he was never late and never lost an hour during his long service.

Mrs. Gertrude Atherton is a hard and systematic worker. She does her own typing on a portable machine. She observes strict office hours and keeps her typewriter humming until tea-time.

The former Crown Prince of Germany is becoming tired of his little island. He has asked for permission to return to Germany or, failing that, to be granted a different residence in Holland.

Miss Mary O'Reilly is the first woman to hold the office of assistant director of the United States Mint. In the absence of the director, she has charge of the manufacture of gold and silver coins. Approximately 700,000,000 coins pass through her hands every year. She receives a salary of $3400 annually.

There is no woman in the United States better known than Mrs. Catt. Like Senator Harding and Governor Cox, she has had editorial experience, having assisted her husband in editing a daily newspaper in an Iowa town. When Mr. Catt died his wife took a position as advertising solicitor. Probably she set type, and she knew all about the business end of journalism.

H. G. Wells and Robert Nichols, the young soldier-poet who visited America a few months ago, are reported as members of a party of workers who have gone to Prague to labor for the welfare of the league of nations. Nichols has brought out a new volume of poems and is nearing the completion of a play, which is eagerly awaited. Wells is, of course, working on a novel.

José Gomez is nationally and popularly decreed the king of bullfighting. He came from bullfight stock. His father before him was a famous slayer and his brothers today stand matadors in his reflected glory. It is said of Gomez that he gained fame earlier than any other of his kind. He was said to have been born a bullfighter rather than to have acquired the art. His father was a celebrated torero of gipsy stock. His elder brother Rafael (El Gallo) is another famous sword. All his sisters married bullfighters. Working up through the ring apprenticeship the young Gomez became a matador—a sword—at the age of seventeen. He was the youngest matador on record.

J. A. Waldron, editor of Judge, is said to be given to hobbies. Though the one of truancy from school and the like early pranks have long since been outgrown, Mr. Waldron numbers about two dozen favorite pastimes in his list of preferred amusements during leisure hours. One of these is for reading. All his life good books have fascinated him. Another is a fondness for making friends with men in the national service, and he is particularly strong for the navy Jackies. Still another of his hobbies is Shakespeare. Shakespeare raw, fried, or broiled, but never roasted, for he is too great an admirer to have any one say anything against the poet. This leads to a monumental piece of work which Mr. Waldron has added to the enormous amount of existing Shakesperiana. Having been brought, about thirty years ago, to certain deductions from some personal research work on the great English playwright, Mr. Waldron followed this up with a careful analysis of the Murray Dictionary which gives the development of English for centuries, and from that proved his opinion that Shakespeare was as great a language creator as he was an author.

Augusto M. Leguia, president of Peru, is a self-made man. For the politically powerful, socially perfect cultured man who is today fashioning the destinies of Peru started out in life without a cent, in a family of no prominence and living far from the capital. Born in the little northern town of Lambayeque in 1863, his first schooling was that afforded by the village licee. Even then he demonstrated his Napoleonic abilities as a leader. His favorite study was mathematics. By tactics understood only among small boys he contrived to make mathematics the favorite study of every pupil in the school. Some black eyes obscuring the features of his schoolmates were never satisfactorily explained to the reverend padre in charge of classes; they were all accidental. But even then common sense and persuasive ability, backed by quick decision, usually won without recourse to heavier weapons. At fifteen Augusto Leguia left Peru for Chile and completed his earlier studies in private schools of Valparaiso. Perhaps of all Peruvians Leguia knows Chile best and is most capable of interpreting Chilean character, motives, thoughts, and plans; at least this is the reputation he enjoys in South America. And in Peru at least he is considered an infallible oracle on the subject of what Chile is about to do at any given moment.

A SINGER AND HER FRIENDS

Liza Lehmann Tells the Story of Her Life Before the Public and at Home.

Mme. Liza Lehmann tells us in the opening words of her autobiography that she was born in London on July 11th—well, several hundred years ago. Her father was a naturalized British subject and he came from Hamburg. Her mother was Scotch, the daughter of Dr. Robert Chambers. Mme. Lehmann was taken to Italy as soon as she was old enough to travel and she spent the first years of her life there, speaking Italian before any other language. Liszt was a particular friend of her parents, often dropping in for his favorite dish of bacon and eggs, and while this was being prepared he would play his newest compositions or rhapsodize in an inspired manner. The author tells us that her father was anxious that she should become a painter, and for a short season she actually attended classes, drew from casts, and had private lessons in perspective. But it was music that lured her the more strongly:

My pianoforte lessons, however, were a source of pure misery to me at this time—in fact, I was given up by one of my first teachers, dear old Henry Bird, as a hopeless case. In after years at how many, many classical concerts have I not sung to his sympathetic accompaniment! But piano technique did not interest me until my imagination was appealed to. As it fell out, the day I was pronounced "hopeless" my parents were dining out, and my father happened to sit next to the well-known pianist and teacher, Mme. Alma Haas. To her he unburdened his parent's chagrin, and she sympathetically offered to hear me. A last chance! My mother cast aside the careworn copies of Clementi and the like, with which I had been wrestling for months, and instead taught me a romantic little piece by Schumann. On the appointed day we presented ourselves for the ordeal. Mme. Haas made me play the Schumann piece twice, and then I heard her slow dictum, and the Delphic oracle was never listened to with keener anxiety: "No—I should not call her unmusical."

While the author was quite a young girl she was taken to sing before Jenny Lind, whose usual manner, she says, was by no means affable. Her Puritanism was of the stern and unbending kind, and she was deeply religious almost to the point of bigotry. Once she made the young Liza put her hand on her chest to note her power of breath control. It was phenomenal. Her chest seemed like an iron safe. Another early acquaintance was Verdi, who once invited the Lehmann family to dinner and served them with a fish about a yard long and decked all down its spine with red camellias. Verdi roared with laughter when Alma Lehmann refused a glass of wine on the ground that it made her cold down the back:

After the gorgeous repast Verdi took us into his bedroom, a cosy little apartment hung with green rep curtains, where he kept his piano hidden. He explained to us that he was so tormented with people who wanted to sing to him or to play to him that he was driven to this device! He insisted, however, that I must sing to him, and, after much pressure, I reluctantly did so; and I hope exercised discretion in that I made no attempt at his own florid music, but merely confined myself to a few old Scotch songs which he had never heard, and which seemed to interest him greatly.

The author tells us that when her mother's health had so far improved as to make possible a residence in London the family took a house in Cromwell Road and later on in St. John's Wood, where they continued to live "until I abandoned my career as a singer, became human, and married." Here it was that she met Bret Harte and received Rubinstein as a frequent visitor:

It was at Ahercorn Place that we saw a good deal of Bret Harte, who lived in the same neighborhood, and who formed the habit of dropping in to tea on Sundays. I remember that he affected very tight patent leather shoes, but they in no way interfered with the brilliant hanter he exchanged with my mother, who never failed in repartee.

An incident occurred while we were still in Cromwell Road, by which I shall always remember that house. My parents gave one of their celebrated music parties, of which Rubinstein, an old friend of theirs, was to be the hright particular star. Stanley, of "Darkest Africa," was also present, rather smileless, but paying much attention to a pretty widow; and the ill-starred Oscar Wilde, then at the height of his popularity, was among the guests.

After dinner Rubinstein played divinely, and several distinguished singers of the day sang. Then, by a kindly meant, but evil inspiration, Rubinstein, who knew I had been studying, asked me to sing! Knowing perfectly well, as I did, that I was still far from being ready for such an ordeal before the cream of artistic London, and prompted by my mother, who, seized with panic, whispered something to the effect of, "Refuse—and don't give way!" I did refuse, with such grace as I could muster. Poor papa! It was too much for him! I suppose he thought it was going to be a case of my mother's lack of courage all over again with me—all study and no results—and instantly he made up his mind to make a firm stand. In an ominous undertone he declared: "Unless you sing, I go to bed." This was, of course, in an aside to me, and it never entered our heads that he would dream of carrying out his threat and leave his guests. But as I, quite limp by now, still hung back I suppose he thought that, having threatened me, he must act up to it; so he left the room and walked upstairs!

The author tells us that her mother was always desperately critical of her singing. Sometimes she would come home from a concert after meeting with a rapturous reception to find her mother sitting up to receive her with: "Well, if that's the way you are going to sing, my advice is—give it up!" The elder lady was naturally of an impatient temperament, but she was always patient with her singing pupils and she had the inestimable gift of tact, which reminds the author of a good story:

An aspiring young diplomat was being questioned as to his suitability for some position within the gift of the Foreign Office. Asked to state his experience and qualifications, he said:

"I have no experience; hut, as to qualifications, I have, sir, the priceless gift of tact. Allow me to give you an example. Last week-end I was stopping at a country house, and, when I went into the bathroom, imagine my discomfiture at finding a lady already in the bath! She had forgotten to lock the door. Did I lose my head? I did nothing of the kind. I merely howed and said, 'Sorry, sir,' and vanished."

History does not relate whether the Foreign Office was sufficiently impressed to employ this valuable youth.

In illustration of another kind of tact—that which is swift to retrieve a faux pas—I think the following that I overheard at a soiree at the Rubinstein Club in New York ranks high: He—Say, look at that old Guy Fawkes in pink satin with a parouet in her hair!

She (frigidly)—That is my mother.

He (roaring)—Ha, ha, ha! is that so? But you should just see mine! ! !

Mme. Lehmann spent the first two years of her married life at Pinner, where her heaviest duty was to comb her Angora cat and to keep house for a perpetually pleased husband, who even forgave the home-made teacake on which he broke on eyetooth. At Pinner she was in the immediate vicinity of her sister, Mrs. Barry Pain, of the W. S. Gilberts, and of Maude Valerie White, in whose company she first learned to cycle:

At Pinner, by the way, she and I tried to become expert cyclists. I remember her telling me that the great "tip" was to have the saddle so low that when you fell off you hadn't far to go! But, in spite of this precaution, I am afraid neither of us made a great success of it. I was always nervous of meeting cattle in the road. In fact, my husband used to say that the appearance of a single cow in the landscape sufficed to send me and my bicycle into the ditch.

One day W. S. Gilbert met me on my "wheel," and said he never was more surprised in his life—in fact, he added somewhat profanely, if wittily: "You might as well expect to meet the Virgin Mary on a bicycle!"

Mme. Lehmann tells us of the work that she did for the stage. She wrote incidental music for H. B. Irving, and this was followed by a romantic light opera, "The Vicar of Wakefield." David Bispham had confided to her his ardent desire to portray the Vicar in song, and so the work was produced with the aid of Laurence Housman, the librettist, and Arthur Boosey, the publisher. This led to an unfortunate dispute with Mr. Housman, who had been too busy to undertake any excisions or revisions and who had therefore given his carte blanche to do anything that was found to be necessary. None the less he was intensely annoyed when he found what had been done, even threatening an injunction to restrain the performance. But the threat was disregarded and the opera was produced with much success. The Daily Chronicle printed the following description:

Not only has the production of the new light opera, "The Vicar of Wakefield," been marked by the disavowal of authorship by the writer, Mr. Laurence Housman, but it has been rendered unique by an episode which is happily rare in theatrical history—the expulsion of its author from his private box on the first night.

The story as related by Mr. Frank Curzon to a Daily Chronicle representative last night was to the effect that his secretary came to him to complain of a gentleman in one of the boxes, who had "laughed derisively" during one of the moments of sentiment in the first act.

"Neither he nor I," said Mr. Curzon, "was aware that it was Mr. Laurence Housman in the box until we found by reference that it was the complimentary box, a ticket for which we had sent him. Mr. Housman—whom I had never met before—has prevented the hook of words being sold in the theatre, and has hindered the production of the play.

"I went to the box and told him he must leave the theatre. Mr. Housman intimated that he did not intend to leave, entirely ignoring the fact that he was there as my guest.

"I'll give you five minutes to go out," I said, adding something to show I was in earnest, and," concluded Mr. Curzon, "that was his cue for the exit."

Mme. Lehmann undertook various American concert tours, by which she means recitals of her compositions sung by a quartet of singers accompanied by herself. She spent a week in San Francisco and was much interested in the remains of the fire, which were still in evidence. Then came the trip to Florida:

By an error of management, said to be unavoidable, we visited Florida at a rather inauspicious time, namely, during Christmas week, when the big hotels were practically empty, and everything was in a state of preparation for the influx of visitors due to arrive in the first weeks of the New Year. So in these parts our audiences consisted to an unusual extent of "darkies," whose high spirits had to be kept in check by white policemen! That the conditions were somewhat rough may be gathered from the following notice which was conspicuously displayed on the walls and in the wings of the theatre where our entertainment took place:

PERFORMERS TAKE NOTICE

WE ARE PLAYING TO LADIES AND CHILDREN AND YOU WILL DO THE MANAGEMENT A FAVOR BY CUTTING OUT ANY DOUBLE ENTENDERS, THE WORD DAMOTTEN OR ANYTHING SUGGESTIVE.

It is natural that the author should have something to say about the American woman. The climate, she remarks, is dry and it is therefore difficult to preserve the complexion, but when nature gives out art steps in, not crudely, but with much discrimination and judgment, generally quite defying detection:

This art may, of course, be pursued to extremes. I remember an American woman once coming into the train in which I and my party were traveling—it was somewhere in the Middle West. She appeared a perfect vision, with a rose-leaf complexion, exquisite hair, and the figure of a goddess—a feast for weary eyes. However, when night came she proceeded in public, and without embarrassment, to divest herself of her beauty. First her entire head of luxuriant tresses was removed and laid on a seat of the carriage; next the aforesaid rose-leaf complexion was transferred with face-cream on to a handkerchief; and lastly, a considerable portion of the figure of a goddess was carefully abstracted and rolled up. All this was done quite frankly and unconcernedly—in fact, when some of my party showed their interest in the proceedings, she gave them all her secrets with the utmost good nature, explaining exactly how it was done, and furnishing them with the addresses of the various stores from which they could, for so-and-so many dollars, obtain the wherewithal to become goddesses, should they so desire. She told us she had been in the "beauty trade," but had now married a millionaire and retired; but, like many other people who retire from their professions, she evidently found some difficulty in giving it up.

Mme. Lehmann received an invitation from Mr. Landon Ronald to a professorship at the Guildhall School of Music and accepted it after some hesitation, and this leads to an amusing story of a dinner party given by Mr. and Mrs. Ronald:

Some time before the war, my husband and I were asked to dine en famille with Mr. and Mrs. Landon Ronald. Mrs. Ronald had provided a delightful menu, as is her wont; two maids waited upon us, and so absorbed were we in doing justice to the viands and in discussing various interesting matters that we scarcely noticed the clumsy waiting of the second parlor-maid until Mrs. Ronald apologized for it, rather elaborately. I thought, saying she regretted having made the experiment of engaging a totally inexperienced parlor-maid from the country. "I see now why we have been invited," I laughingly answered—"it is a case of trying it on the dog!"—and, after thus having our attention drawn to it, we certainly did begin to notice that the vegetables were being handed to our right ear-lohes, the wine was being poured on to the tablecloth instead of into the glasses, and so on. Finally the second parlor-maid fled from the room, doubled up with what appeared to be uncontrollable hysterics—and, as she fled, I really looked at her for the first time, and said: "Poor girl!—do you know, her profile reminds me of Irene Scharrer."

And then suddenly it dawned on me that a hoax had been played on us (though it was not the 1st of April), and I cried "It is Irene Scharrer!" And it was; and she promptly returned, in cap and apron, to finish dinner with us.

Incidentally we have a story of the late King Edward:

The late King Edward was always very kind to my father, and bought several of his pictures, besides sitting to him for the pencil drawing now in the British Museum. I remember a charming little incident characteristic of his noted geniality and kindness of heart.

One summer at Homburg, when I was quite a girl, my father and I were sitting in the park under the trees, listening to the orchestra. It was evening, and growing rather dark. King Edward presently arrived and made his way to a seat a few rows in front of us. Recognizing my father, he smiled, and made a friendly movement with his hand; hut, alas! papa, who was rather short-sighted, did not perceive it. In vain I whispered, "Look, papa, the King—over there—against those trees on the right." My poor father kept peering in the wrong direction, till at last the cheery royal voice rang out, "I'm over here, Mr. Lehmann!" and the difficulty was overcome.

The book ends with the opening of the war. The author tells us that her husband immediately offered his services and did much good work in commanding naval guns during the London raids:

My eldest son, Rudolf, was then seventeen years old. He and his younger brother, Leslie, both went to Selwyn House School, Broadstairs, and from there they went on to Marlborough College. Rudie was just leaving Marlborough and wanted to join up at once; but, much to his chagrin and to my thankfulness, this had to be postponed for about a year, as an attack of measles had left him with a slight affection of the heart. This, however, yielded to treatment, and indeed nature had endowed him with an excellent constitution. None the less the delay chafed his young spirit terribly, and he insisted on my taking him again and again to be examined by a heart specialist. He was so anxious to be pronounced "fit" that he always insisted on walking at a snail's pace, for fear of making his heart beat faster and postponing the longed-for pronouncement. I can see him still, creeping along Clarges Street!

Mme. Lehmann died about two weeks after completing her memoirs, "full of a magnificent courage," says her husband in an afterword, "and with the perfect serenity of one already quit of the dross of this world."

THE LIFE OF LIZA LEHMANN. By Herself. With many illustrations. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $5.

How can an honest man who lays claim to normal intelligence walk up to the voting booth with a clear head when he can hardly breathe for the election literature that is crammed into his pockets, and this at a time when the fatherland is suffering as never before from paper shortage? Where can a man who loves peace and quiet go so as not to be pestered by these everlasting showers of pamphlets, each proclaiming the virtues of its candidate and its party? Our politicians should go to London, and there they can see, under a glass case in the British Museum, a model of an election bulletin. It was in the year 19 A. D. one Lucius Popidius was a candidate for the position of ædilis (magistrate). This was the sole and only campaign document his party issued: "See to it that L. Popidius is made ædilis. He deserves it!" Oh peace that was Rome's in those days!

Radium being incomparably more costly than gold naturally has to be carefully guarded, and a special safe for this most precious of metals is possessed by the British Radium Corporation. The safemaker had, like Caesar at Alesia, to face his defences both ways. To defy burglars' tools he had to have walls of steel, and to keep the radium emanations from escaping he had to construct an interior cage of lead, lead being practically the only metal not penetrable by the rays. Another difficulty to be overcome was the construction of a door that would prevent the loss of emanations when it was opened. Valves are fixed in the door, through which tubes of mercury can be passed for the collection and storage of the emanations.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending October 9, 1920, were $161,400,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $158,000,000; a gain of $3,400,000.

In its weekly comparative statement of condition made public Saturday, October 9th, the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco reports an increase of $5,597,000 in total gold reserves over the reserves of last week.

Total gold reserves this week are reported at $159,637,000, of which amount $66,768,000 is held by banks within the Twelfth Federal Reserve District, as against $56,037,000 for the week ended October 1st. Total reserves are reported at $160,183,000, as against $154,623,000 last week.

The total of bills on hand, reported at $231,574,000, is $4,041,000 less than the total volume of outstanding credit may be anticipated. Meanwhile, through the shifting of credits and through the facilities of the Federal Reserve system, pressure on the banking facilities of particular sections is being distributed throughout the banking system and the strength of the credit structure as a whole is absolutely sound and unimpaired.

"A number of factors have facilitated the improvement in the credit outlook. As the continued improvement in transportation permits more normal movements of commodities, the mobility of credits is gradually being restored. Progress is being made in the liquidation of commodity stocks and loans against them. While the downward trend of prices involves current difficulties, it is a movement toward greater rather than less stability in both the credit and the general business situation, since it tends to reduce the pressure on banking facilities and at the same time to stimulate the large potential demand for goods which increasingly high prices had impaired. In contrast with the movement in progress a year ago, therefore, the general trend of business conditions within the United States is in the direction of increasing soundness and stability.

"During the period of August 16th-September 15th money rates in the New York market have been without much fluctuation. Commercial borrowings in the open market continued at a firm level of 8 per cent. Call loans on securities ruled at about 7 per cent. with a moderate upward movement about the first of September, since when they have again declined from a basis of from 6 to 7 per cent. Extensive operations of the Federal treasury, including the issue and retirement of a large volume of certificates of indebtedness and the collection of the third quarterly installment of income and profits taxes, have had little influence on money rates. Near the close of the period quotations for time money on collateral of securities became somewhat easier, although the volume of business done continued small.

"The improvement which bond market experienced during the preceding month has continued through the current period. Investment buying of corporate and particularly of railroad securities has been good and the price trend has continued upward.

"A number of new corporate and railroad security offerings have been floated successfully, notable among them being the $25,000,000 issue of ten-year 7 per cent. bonds by the New York Central Railroad Company. Interest has been centered chiefly, however, on the flotation of the $100,000,000 French government loan, issued in preparation for the retirement at maturity of the Anglo-French loan. This issue, bearing 8 per cent. interest, maturing in twenty-five years, and containing provisions for annual redemptions after five years at 110, was quickly oversubscribed, with a gratifyingly wide distribution among investors."

Refunding of the Liberty Loans at maturity will probably be necessary, according to the National Bank of Commerce in New York. In the current issue of its magazine, Commerce Monthly, the bank points out that this is indicated by the relatively early period within which the bulk of our public debt falls due, together with the demand for tax reduction and the uncertainty as to repayment of the advances made to the Allied governments.

"The policy which has been followed in American war loan financing will make necessary large refunding operations," the bank states. "From the treasury point of view this may have its advantages, for it may be possible to issue some of the refunding loans at lower interest rates. In so far as lower rates can be secured, the policy will have justified itself. In any event the optional maturities in effect between 1927 and 1947 give the treasury a satisfactory control over debt payment during that period."

In discussing the relation of taxation to debt reduction, the bank says:

"It should be observed that the marked trend of American fiscal policy toward direct forms of taxation within the past decade reduced the probability of rapid debt payment. After the civil war, while a high tariff was incidentally piling up huge surpluses in the treasury, debt payment even at high premiums seemed a desirable means of returning to circulation money then locked up in treasury vaults. Because the tax burden was then only indirectly felt, these recurrent surpluses were endured; now that the burden is in the main direct, it can hardly be expected that collection of revenue beyond the ordinary needs of government will go unchallenged, or that the payment of a debt which can be postponed will be generally regarded as one of the ordinary needs of government."

As a result of the coal shortage which menaces the world only the United States and Great Britain are assured of sufficient fuel to operate their industries at capacity during the coming winter, according to Joseph A. Broderick, vice-president of the National Bank of Commerce in New York. In an article on the international coal trade in the October issue of Commerce Monthly, the bank's magazine, he points out that although eventually a balance will be reached between demand and production, this can not be hoped for in the near future. Neither shipments from new and remote fields nor the increased use of fuel oil and other substitutes will solve the problem for the present.

The article indicates that at the present rate of monthly receipts not a single importing country in Europe or South America is receiving a supply which is even approximately adequate. France is now receiving coal at about two-thirds the rate which would be necessary to assure operation of French industries at capacity; Italian receipts are about three-fifths of the estimated necessary amount; Netherlands is receiving only one-third the amount of coal required by its industries, and Norway is receiving approximately one-half. The situation is no better in the case of the other chief European and South American buyers in the international market.

"Only two countries of the world, the United States and the United Kingdom, today have reasonable assurance of sufficient coal to operate their industries at capacity during the coming winter," Mr. Broderick says. "In order to attain this security a definite limit has been placed upon the amount of British coal available for export, and in the United States exports have been automatically held in check by measures taken to assure domestic supplies. The fuel problem is the foremost question facing the industry of every country of western Europe, except the United Kingdom. It is also to the fore in a number of countries outside Europe, chiefly those countries of South America which have heretofore been dependent on imported coal.

"The international coal trade is entirely dominated by the United Kingdom, Germany, and the United States. Not only is the coal supply of importing countries now dependent upon the mines of these three countries, but there is no prospect for years to come of important additions from other sources to the amount of coal available for the export market. The recent emphasis placed upon small shipments from new and remote coal fields has been entirely out of proportion to their relation to the issue. A similar overemphasis has also been placed on the proposed use of substitutes. Regardless of what the more remote future may hold, the present fuel problem will not be solved by the substitution of fuel oil for coal. The production of electricity from water-power necessitates elaborate installations at a time when capital is costly and difficult to secure, and extensive water-power projects require years for completion. Wood and peat are but poor substitutes for coal, and for many uses lignite likewise is highly unsatisfactory. Modern industry has been built on coal, and it is dependent on adequate supplies for its maintenance.

"The total shortage of coal in the international market is only a small part of the difference between actual production and probable output had the war not occurred, but when measured in terms of the effect on the countries which are suffering this shortage it is acute, and the only hope of meeting it lies in the productive capacity of the United Kingdom, the United States, and Germany."

According to threshing returns the general harvest throughout the Dominion is greater in volume than that of last year by 21 per cent. The yield of wheat is approximately 267,000,000 bushels; of oats, 496,000,000 bushels, and of barley, 63,000,000 bushels. The corresponding figures in 1919 were as follows: wheat, 193,000,000 bushels; oats, 394,000,000 bushels, and barley, 56,000,000 bushels (says the Canadian Bank of Commerce in its September monthly commercial letter).

At the end of the last fiscal year Canada's favorable trade balance was $175,000,000, but since then, for the four months ending July, the excess of imports has amounted to $124,000,000 and customs receipts in August indicate no diminution of imports as compared with July. Canada, therefore, approaches the season during which exports attain their greatest volume with an adverse balance. So far the harvest season has been a favorable one, and hopes are materializing of a yield of field produce considerably above the average. Of grain and its products there will be a substantial increase in the amount available for export. For the twelve months ending July, grain and wheat flour exports represented 22.7 per cent.; in 1919, 20.7 per cent., and in 1918, 31.4 per cent. of the total. The maintenance of the volume of such staple exports as these and meats may be looked for, with a material gain in dairy products, living animals, tobacco, and flax. For our forest products, in which is included paper, and for certain minerals, notably asbestos, the demand remains firm. Generally, the outlook as to the volume of exportable merchandise is satisfactory.

On the other hand, there does not appear to be any sign of our imports diminishing.

From the United Kingdom imports for the twelve months ending July amounted to $191,000,000 as compared with $75,000,000 in the previous twelve months. The low value of the pound sterling may furnish some explanation of this growth, but, while dollar exchange has been high, purchases from the United States have also increased substantially. These, for the twelve months ending July last, amounted to $881,000,000, as compared with $695,000,000 in 1919. Similarly purchases from Cuba increased from $4,350,000 to $30,500,000. Of particular commodities imported, there is a decided increase in breadstuffs, cotton, flax, furs, hides and skins, leather, iron and steel, rubber, silk, sugar, automobiles, wood, and wool. The extraordinary increase in sugar imported is partly accounted for by the increased volume of the exports into which sugar largely enters. During the fiscal year ending March last the value of sugar products exported was $30,000,000, as compared with $3,200,000 in the previous year. Other imports, however, such as rubber, vehicles, iron, and steel, are not offset to so great an extent by increased exports of these commodities or others in the making of which they are an important factor. It might also be mentioned as indicative of the character of many purchases made, that the increase in the value of diamonds imported within the fiscal year is 257 per cent., or from $1,250,000 to $4,470,000. It is thus obvious that the consumption in Canada of costly imported goods continues. While the exports of the remaining months of the year will be in increased volume, their value, in view of falling prices and of increased production in other countries, may not exceed that of the imports sufficiently to cover interest and other charges for services due abroad.

Adverse balances were usually met, prior to the war, by borrowings abroad which could be effected at the rates of interest relatively low as compared with those current in Canada. The situation is now, however, reversed by the high rates of interest prevailing in Great Britain and the United States, in consequence of which it has been found more profitable to dispose of our securities in Canada. In the case of Great Britain the unfavorable state of the market is aggravated by the low rate of sterling exchange. On the other hand, in order to effect sales in the United States, Canadian securities must be offered at prices to yield the purchasers not less than 7½ per cent. It can not be expected, therefore, that borrowings abroad will

Recently national banks in at least three states have added the words "trust company" to their title by permission of the controller of the currency, and have been granted trust powers by the Federal Reserve Board. In view of the precedents now established and the fact that many banks "already have availed themselves of the privilege of exercising trust powers coextensive with those of state institutions," much interest, in the opinion of Finance and Industry (Cleveland), attaches to these questions: "Will national banks generally find it advantageous to change their titles so as to better advertise their privilege to perform fiduciary functions? What would be the probable effect upon state institutions exercising trust powers?" The Ohio financial weekly discusses the subject as follows:

"Prior to September 26, 1918, national banks might be granted permission to act only in limited trust capacities, as trustee, executor, administrator, and registrar of stocks and bonds. On this date an amendment to the Federal Reserve Act authorized and empowered the Federal Reserve Board:

"To grant by special permit to national banks applying therefor, when not in contravention of state or local law, the right to act as . . . guardian of estate, assignee, receiver, committee of estates of lunatics, or in any other fiduciary capacity in which state banks, trust companies, or other corporations which come into competition with national banks are permitted to act under the laws of the state in which the national bank is located."

"National banks are required by law to use the word 'national' in their titles. This would always distinguish between national and state institutions, even though exercise of trust powers and use of the words 'trust company' in the names of national banks became general. But the casual observer there would be less distinction, as regards title, between the two classes of institutions. Some bankers thought this might tend to shift from state banks to national banks some of the trust business now transacted by the former.

"However, attention apparently is centered more largely upon new business possibilities. It is recognized that the trust field has by no means been covered. This is particularly true in this state, where the fiduciary powers of both state and national banks were limited in important respects until enactment of the Ohio Banking Code a little more than a year ago.

"With national as well as state banks in the field, advertising trust functions through their titles as well as by other means, the belief was expressed that the activities of trust departments of all banks would be greatly extended. The public would be more apt to take trust business to banks if many more such institutions were equipped, as their names indicated, to handle it.

"While only one national bank in Ohio has added the words 'trust company' to its title so far as known, many have been granted permission to exercise trust powers. At the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland it was learned that up to June 30, 1920, fifty-seven national banks in this state had been granted such powers. Since that time many applications had been received and a number acted upon favorably. The larger national banks predominated among those granted or seeking trust powers."

The Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company in connection with their participation in the new issue of Canadian National Railway twenty-year 7 per cent. debenture quote from an article in the Wall Street Journal on Canadian securities:

"Canadian securities, including government and corporation issues, have maintained a comparatively stable position throughout the war and since, both in Canada and in the United States, where a large amount is held. This reflects the skilled handling of Canadian government financing during the war and the relatively strong financial position of the country when it emerged from the conflict.

"During the war Canada issued war loans amounting to $2,353,995,650, of which approximately $2,000,000,000 is outstanding. It also advanced to European countries $340,350,843, as follows: Great Britain, $202,605,094; Great Britain (advances chartered banks), $100,000,000; France, $5,519,047; Roumania, $22,273,467; Belgium, $1,734,295; Greece, $8,118,940.

"On March 31, 1920, gross debt of the Dominion of Canada was $3,014,483,774, of which $1,078,537,461 constituted revenue-producing debts. During and since the war Canada has floated six loans aggregating $1,050,000,000, all of which was largely oversubscribed.

"Unlike the United States and other countries, the government of Canada by arrangement with bankers and Stock Exchange members stabilized prices of government war loans, with the result that for most of the time these loans sold near par. Recently the committee fixed the prices of the war loans as follows:

Maturity.	Old Price.	New Price.	Yield.
1922.....	99	98	6.38%
1923.....	99	98	6.14%
1927.....	99½	97	6.00%
1937.....	99½	96½	5.88%
1937.....	101	98	5.68%
1924.....	98	97	6.27%
1934.....	96	93	6.24%

"Canada gold 5 per cent. bonds, issued in 1917, are payable in the United States as well as Canada. They are selling in New York on a 6.40 per cent. basis.

"Now that more than half of Canadian railroad mileage is under government control and rates have recently been increased, the securities of these companies are likely to become unusually popular both in Canada and the United States. In May of this year Canadian National Railways sold $15,000,000 fifteen-year 7 per cent. sinking fund equipment trust certificates through local bankers. These bonds were offered to the public at 99 and interest to yield about 7.10 per cent. They were quickly absorbed by American investors and are now selling close to par.

"Canada will not do any borrowing this year, according to Minister of Militia and Defense Guthrie, in a recent interview published in the Wall Street Journal. This will leave the field open for extensive corporation financing and some choice issues may be floated in this country."

E. H. Rollins & Sons and the National City Bank are offering a block of the Government of Newfoundland 5½ per cent. gold bonds at 85¼ and interest, to yield 6.90 per cent. Principal and interest of these bonds are payable at the option of the holder in United States gold coin in New York City. Newfoundland is the oldest colony of the British Empire, having come into England's possession in 1497. It has a population estimated at 250,000.

Offered by the Freeman, Smith & Camp Company, $124,234 City of Astoria, Oregon, 6 per cent. improvement bonds in denominations of $500, price 99, to yield 6.05 to 6.82 per cent.

Astoria, county seat of Clatsop County, is situated at the mouth of the Columbia River. It is the third largest city in the state and second in commercial importance, occupying one of the most advantageous positions on the Pacific Coast. It is headquarters for the Columbia River salmon fisheries and the centre for great lumbering operations. Other important industries are dairying and stock-raising.

Astoria is a modern city and a jobbing point of importance. It has bank deposits aggregating $8,000,000. Astoria has expended over $3,000,000 on harbor improvements and terminal facilities. Its harbor is the most important between Puget Sound and San Francisco. Astoria's municipally-owned water system has always been on a paying basis. Water revenues exceed operating expenses, water bond interest, and sinking fund requirements.

A History of Italy.

Mrs. Trevelyan was doubtless aware of the difficulties that confronted her when she began to write her history of Italy. She intended to cover a period of some seventeen centuries, that is to say from the time of Diocletian to the formation of the present kingdom. Presumably she had in mind some such volume as she has now given to us, a volume of about 600 pages. Now there are only two ways in which such a history can be written. Either it must consist of little more than a chronological table of events, or there must be a choice of some definite line of advance to the exclusion, or nearly to the exclusion, of all others. Now the history of Italy is the most eventful that the race has yet given to us. Italy was not only the mistress of the world in the political sense. She was also its leader in religion, art, music, and letters. She may be likened, not only to a chain of mountains, but to many parallel chains of mountains. The historian must choose which line of crests he will traverse unless he is prepared to produce a work that shall be monumental in size.

Mrs. Trevelyan has chosen the political line, with occasional deviations where the presentation of her subject seems to demand it. But even here the condensation is necessarily so great as to obscure what may be called the heart of the nation and to the exclusion of many of what may be called the imponderables. For example, we should like to know the effect upon the mind of the people of the barbarian invasions, the invasions of the Lombards and the Byzantines, of the civil wars, and of the internecine disunities that gradually gave way before the forces of unification. It is in no disparagement of the work that these omissions are noted. They were inevitable in any single volume of portable size. Mrs. Trevelyan probably knows as much of the history of Italy as any one living. It has been her life study. And perhaps it would be ungrateful to regret that she has not written half a dozen volumes instead of one, so that she might show us, not only the mountain peaks, but the valleys between.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE ITALIAN PEOPLE FROM THE BARBARIAN INVASIONS TO THE ATTAINMENT OF UNITY. By Janet Penrose Trevelyan. With twenty-four illustrations and six maps. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Theodore Roosevelt.

At a time when the biographer seems to be losing all sense of limitation we may congratulate Mr. Pearson on the 159 pages in which he is content to tell the story of Roosevelt's life. It is not, of course, a true biography, but it will be accepted as such by many busy people who will be satisfied with so good a summary of chief events and with a modesty of panegyric that is as rare a biographical virtue as brevity. Mr. Roosevelt, says the author, ought not to be compared with Lincoln. "There has been no character in our land like Lincoln; he stands alone. What we can say of Roosevelt, now, is that he was admired and beloved by millions of his fellow-countrymen while he lived; that his was an extraordinary and entirely different character from that of any of our Presidents; and that upon his death thousands who had opposed him and bitterly hated him but a few years before were altering their opinion and speaking of him in admiration—with more than the mere respect which custom pays to the dead."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT. By Edmund Lester Pearson. New York: The Macmillan Company; $1.75.

Interior Decoration.

That we are slowly emerging from barbarism is proved by the demand for such books as this. It is true that its appeal will be to the righteous rather than to the sinners, who will still revel in the domestic atrocities that shine and glitter and that carry pretense upon their unblinking fronts. But the heaven will work. It is working already. Our house interiors are, if not more beautiful, at least less ugly, and there are those among us conscious of possessing no taste who are anxious to acquire it.

This fine volume contains no Ten Commandments of interior decorating, but it gives us some fine examples of the art from which the intelligent reader may come to grips with his own vague aspirations. Here we have a history of decorating and a discussion of the various decoration epochs such as Renaissance and Baroque. Then we have a presentation of modern tendencies and hints as to their proper application, nor must we forget the valuable chapter on Color and Color Schemes. The authors do not profess to tell us how to decorate a house, but they tell us how many beautiful houses have been decorated, while allowing us an insight into principles that will prove the safest of all guides.

THE PRACTICAL BOOK OF INTERIOR DECORATION. By Harold Donaldson Eberlein, Abbot McClure, and Edward Stratton Holloway. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company.

Briefer Reviews.

A particularly attractive verse book for children is "The Imp of Mischief," by Olive Chandler, with illustrations in color by Rachel Marshall. The verse is of good quality, the pictures are vivid, and the text is in hold type. The book is published by E. P. Dutton & Co. Price, $2.

"The Young Citizen's Own Book," by Chelsea Curtis Fraser (Thomas Y. Crowell Company), describes in easy, chatty style for boys just how the various branches of our public affairs are managed—with the "why" of a good many things that even older citizens of voting age are prone to forget.

"The Business Man's English," by Wallace Edgar Bartholomew and Floyd Hurlbut (the Macmillan Company), is intended to impart a knowledge of how business should be transacted and also "to insure the understanding of the English of business through the introduction of an unusually large number of exercises that deal directly with business situations." Oral English also receives prominent treatment.

The Century Company has published "Jimmy Bunn Stories," by Henry C. Walker. Jimmy Bunn, the rabbit, is the central character of the book and the present-day fables and folklore tales in which he takes part are told with much charm and originality. They are full of fun and humor that appeal to the healthy normal youngster, and they frequently point a moral in such kindly fashion that small ears take it in with no effort.

"The Blue Pearl," by Samuel Seville, Jr. (Century Company), is a story with its setting in the woods of the great Northwest. A group of Boy Scouts are challenged to overcome obstacles and meet the most extraordinary dangers, this time the prize being a marvelous blue pearl worth $50,000. The challenge is accepted, and the narrative of the Scouts threading the primeval forests on the trail of the blue pearl makes a story of interest.

The Thomas Y. Crowell Company has just published two books by Inez M. McFee. The first is entitled "Boy Heroes in Fiction" and the second "Girl Heroines in Fiction." The former contains sketches of Little Gavroche, David Balfour, Oliver Twist, Jim Davis, David Copperfield, Jim Hawkins, and John Halifax. The latter includes Little Dorrit, Maggie Tulliver, Ellen, Little Nell, Eppie, and Cozette. The sketches are well written and well illustrated.

Seneschal's Margaret." It is unknown as yet whether or not this is the final work from the pens of the Castles, but there is reason for the many admirers of these writers congratulating themselves over the fact that it is one of their very best pieces of fiction.

Doubleday, Page & Co. announce for early publication the reminiscences of Melville E. Stone, who for the past twenty years has been general manager of the Associated Press. "I found 'gay life' in New York immensely and soherly respectable," writes Sir Philip Gihbs in "People of Destiny," his new book, just brought out by the Harpers. "One could take one's maiden aunt into the heart of it," he continues, "and not get hot by her blushes. In fact, it is the American maiden aunt who sets the pace of the fox-trot and the one-step in dancing rooms where there are music and afternoon tea."

The hurried launching of lifeboats from disabled vessels is usually attended by confusion and danger. WHY ARE MANY WILLS "BROKEN"?

One reason is that a will is not like a contract. There is no "party of the second part" present when it is written, to pick out flaws which might be entering wedges for selfish interests later. It is a "one-sided" instrument.

An attorney can find in advance the places in a will which will not "hold water" legally. Often these flaws are entirely hidden to others.

This is the reason his counsel is so valuable.

The Bank of California is familiar with the administration of estates and when named trustee or executor it is our practice to retain the attorney of decedent to handle the necessary legal work.

Proportional Form.

It is strange that so little attention has been given to the laws of proportion and of periodicity that govern nature. This may be due to the fact that they are so inimical to the theories of chance that have obsessed the scientific mind, for there can be no greater mistake than to suppose that science pursues the truth with a single eye. But that is a matter that need not now be discussed.

Samuel Colman, N. A., and C. Arthur Coan, LL. B., first attracted attention by their book, "Nature's Harmonic Unity," and now they give us further studies of the same problems. Why does nature geometrize, so to speak? Why is she unvarying in her attention to number, assigning whole departments of herself to the threes, the fives, and the sevens, playing her endless harmonies with her curves, ellipses, eccentrics, and spirals? The same geometric precision is to be found in the tiniest seashell and in a solar system. Sound, color, and heat obey the same laws and are periodic. Even the chemical elements arrange themselves into octaves and the "lost canon of proportion" owes its only secrecy to its universality.

The authors have written an admirable and a beautiful book. Without indulging in immature theories they show us something of the laws of number and of proportion that prevail everywhere, something of the great kingdoms of nature that are dominated by geometry. No one can read it without a stimulation of his sense of mystery and perhaps there can be nothing more useful than this to a world whose illumination has always something of the devilish in it.

A Garden of Peace.

It is a comfort to know that there is peace somewhere, even though it be only in Mr. Frankfort Moore's garden. Assuredly it seems to be a most peaceful place and its creation the most peaceful of avocations. Mr. Moore tells us all about it in a book that seems at first glance to be alarmingly large, but that is so beguilingly written as to prove quite short. Mr. Moore is too good a writer to bore us with his garden by telling us of nothing else. Quite an assortment of nice people are to be found in the garden, and there are also ruminations about other gardens and about the art of gardening from earth's earliest ages until now. Mr. Moore's book gives us a distinctly peaceful feeling, although we have a foreboding that it will not last.

A GARDEN OF PEACE. By F. Frankfort Moore. With illustrations. New York: George H. Doran Company.

The Devil's Paw.

Mr. E. Phillips Oppenheim gives us fair warning that "the characters in this story are entirely fictitious, and bear no relation to any living person. Where, for the development of the plot, persons bolding public offices are mentioned, these are entirely imaginary creations." Perhaps the warning was a necessary one. There were undoubtedly pacifists in England during the war and there can be no doubt that the extreme labor men were willing enough to fall into the German trap and to coerce the government into a premature and disastrous armistice. Since no one knows quite what went on in the horrid medley of pacifists, spies, plotters, traitors, and emotionalists we may admit that Mr. Oppenheim's guess is as good as another's. But we wish that his characters were more virile. They are a rather musby lot.

"THE TYPHOON."

Mr. Maitland having, with great presence of mind, fired the job-for collection who showed in "The Admirable Crichton" that they couldn't act, has got things reorganized in his company and this week is giving a very creditable performance of "The Typhoon." This play, it will be remembered, was a starring vehicle for Walker Whiteside. It is a play of Continental authorship, the writer a Hungarian, Melchior Lengyl by name. Walker Whiteside has a taste for the melodramatic, and anyway nearly all English translations—whether British or American—of Continental plays do injustice to the original by suppressing or transferring features which might be supposed to bring blushes to the cheek of supposititious innocence. Therefore there are, presumably, slight deviations from lifelikeness in "The Typhoon" which the Hungarian Lengyl may not be responsible for.

As a high-class melodrama "The Typhoon" is unquestionably very striking. The transplantation of the Japanese motive to Occidental drama, the mingling and the interrelations of the Occidental and the Oriental types, and the development of the murderous brainstorm in Tokerao's self-sacrificing and patriotic soul are all very effectively indicated. Also, the character of Helena the courtesan, disagreeable though it is, has that aspect of life-likeness which, although in this case antagonistic to the sympathies, adds an exotic interest to the play.

Mr. Maitland has done some highly commendable work in accomplishing a Japanese atmosphere, there being six Japanese characters in the play, all given with due Japanese effect.

Mr. Maitland himself plays the part of Tokerao, the Japanese patriot, and, except for his height and the un-Japanese length of his legs, his conception was more than satisfactory and his submergence in the rôle successfully achieved. His players carefully suppressed their native American traits in the six rôles of the polite, impassive little Nipponese. Mr. Richard Lancaster in the rôle of the wise, astute old counselor-in-chief to the group of Nipponese being particularly acceptable.

The part of Helena Kerner, the perverse and high-tempered beauty who was Tokerao's mistress, was entrusted to the new leading lady, Mildred Cates, whose work was so conscientiously undertaken that she gave the proper impression of a very improper and unmanageable individual: a being something like a high, shrewish, nasty gale blowing over a fine landscape—the beauty of the self-sufficient daughter of joy being representative of the landscape.

The new leading man, in the character of the impetuous artist Lindner, who so violently execrates the impassive men of Nippon to their very faces, did really good work, making the character stand out in stronger lines than with the Whiteside production: the which greatly consoled the Smythe mourners; and the remainder of the company did so well that they atoned for the unfortunate week already referred to.

The Maitland Theatre is newly decorated. What extravagance, for the green crepe walls still looked fresh and unfaded. But blue velvet has supplanted the green, and the little theatre looks very sumptuous.

"WAY DOWN EAST" AT THE CURRAN.

We've all seen it, of course, in the spoken drama, and have no difficulty in recalling its rather labored comedy and old-fashioned melodrama. We say to ourselves, therefore, "For goodness' sake, why is Griffith taking up with 'Way Down East'?"

But that film genius knows just what he is about. He knows well the drawing capacity of a familiar name, and as "Way Down East" has always been very popular with a large section of theatre-goers he is well aware that he can rely on their curiosity to see their favorite handsomely, or at least completely, presented as a picture play.

So there they are, blissfully happy with all the dear old melodramatic situations made enormously effective with a wider setting. "Old Homestead" New Englanders, a suggestion of "Shore Acres," the "Hazel Kirke" incident of throwing out an innocently-wronged girl in a terrific storm, the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" incident of crossing the ice. Ah, there we have it!

Beautiful as the earlier farm and rural life pictures were, as soon as we came to the storm—and they do make superb photographs of storms for the picture plays—we knew why the astute Griffith had fixed his weather eye on this play. It was the wild storm and the girl's flight to the Connecticut River full of ice floes in which Griffith recognized the great pictorial possibilities.

The storm is a good, old-fashioned nor'easter and no mistake. We see the terrific movements of the tempest: when the hapless victim is thrust forth by the self-righteous old squire—for it is the kind of gale that no one can stand against—and Anna, as with bent head she struggles along, falls repeatedly. Then by gradual degrees the pictures flashed upon the screen show us the slow and painful progress of the fugitive to the river.

And such wonderful pictures there are to depict the storm! The air is full of a strange, ominous, sleety whiteness, through which we sense the beat and throb of the tempest. There is something awe-inspiring about such manifestations of nature's power, for the shriek and clamor of the gale are duly suggested, and the camera man—we can imagine what an expert a Griffith camera man must be—has in a series of splendidly successful pictures shown us old Mother Nature in a cold, deadly, yet violent and murderous rage.

The whole series, however, leads up to the culminating pictures depicting Anna traveling over the boiling surface of the great, wide, impressive river from one ice-floe to the other, the wild white foam swirling and the hungry waves reaching up like cruel claws to seize and tear.

How in the world they manage it all I would very much like to know. Lillian Gish couldn't really have periled her expensive, movie-star life in the thrilling way she seemed to in those pictures. Why, the thing actually seemed real. One wanted to weep from sheer excitement, and I never saw a picture-play audience roused to such demonstrations of emotion. And there was the hero-man as well—played by Richard Barthelmess, who looks like a pretty girl, only he is more self-conscious—pursuing, with courageous solicitude and at the risk of his precious young life, the poor fugitive over those perilously rocking ice-floes until she was caught up with, gathered in the arms of the young athlete, and, on an even more dangerous and exciting trip, brought to safety.

For this part of the picture play alone "Way Down East" is well worth seeing, for the fans can not fail to capture those thrills and spinal quivers which are to them as a rare dish to a gourmet. Besides all these rich and rare excitements they threw in a lot of extras; a city dancing party, for instance, which amounted to a fashion show. No, nobody can get ahead of D. W. Griffith. In an intensely interesting leaflet he tells of the large engineering staff busy for two months during the ice-break upon the river, and bless us, but the man actually offers to furnish auditors to prove the expenditure of $800,000 necessary to picture the scenes staged on that mighty tide. But we all believe it without proof.

STANDARD DRAMA AT ALCAZAR.

It is a particularly interesting week at the Alcazar, there being presented there "The Hypocrites," a well-known play by Sir Henry Arthur Jones. This gives us an opportunity to admire anew the careful construction of a Jones play, and, as they have just withdrawn Galsworthy's "The Elder Son" at the Maitland Theatre, to compare the old-fashioned and the more modern view of how to treat the woman wronged.

Jones, always a conservative and vigorous moralist, believes in only one alternative: make the man right the wrong by marrying the girl. In "Hindle Wakes," another famous standard play put on at the Maitland some weeks ago, as in Galsworthy's "The Elder Son," we see the application of the idea that this is not necessarily a solution, for in both these plays the girl affronts the conventional idea by turning down her tardy wooer and electing to remain free.

However, Jones' conservatism is more acceptable to general opinion, and his sturdy scorn of hypocrisy in the clerical and upper classes meets with more general approval, more particularly as there is no solution offered to a problem by the two more modern authors, while Jones' solution is the good old-fashioned one, enthroned in tradition: cure wounded honor by a probably unhappy marriage.

Jones, however, meets that situation by making the unappealed love of the young offenders against society a strong bond to draw them together again, the scene in which the lover flings cold calculation to the winds and claims the self-sacrificing victim being one that is charged with a quality of thrillingness that makes every pulse beat faster. It is not only the romantic satisfaction of seeing love vindicated, but of feeling a militant joy at seeing the base conspiracy of the worldly hypocrites overthrown and the young lover recovering his sense of manliness and of protection to the poor stray he was going so cruelly to disavow and discard.

The company, as always happens in plays of the kind, made a particularly good showing. The cast was strengthened by the presence of Emelie Melville, who, in the rôle of the mother, acted with star-like authority and distinction. Dudley Ayres was more forceful and impressive than he generally has opportunity to be in the rôle of the curate who roused to militant might when wrong threatened. Inez Ragan was obliged to be monotonously sad as the wronged girl, and Ben Erway, who is a bright youngster and a versatile, played the rôle of the young lover very acceptably. Henry Shumer also made a good appearance as the worldly and self-indulgent Vicar, and the remaining ten rôles were filled in a particularly creditable manner, the opening performance going with noticeable smoothness and finish, showing more than usually careful preparation.

SCOTTI GRAND OPERA CONCERT.

Last Sunday night at the Exposition Auditorium they spilled out caskfuls of vocal riches from Scotti's collection of human gems. For really they did seem like gems of humanity, all those handsome, gifted young people, their enthusiasm untarnished by time, the brilliancy of their voices undimmed by overuse, and their faces characterized by the freshness and charm of youth.

There was Ruth Miller, the coloratura soprano, who sang "Una voce poco fa," her notes pouring forth in a shower of crystal. Pretty gowned, a picture to look at, a delightful voice, one thought what riches! How good is destiny to this lavishly endowed young being.

Two favorite daughters, Francisca Peralta (Phyllis Parlington) and Doria Fernanda (Fernanda Pratt), also won the warm approval of the large audience. Two full-throated, deep-bosomed, Juno-armed, strong-voiced young women they are, gifted by the gods with personality, beauty of voice, and the ability to please, they won such salvos of applause, Francisca Peralta with an aria from "Aida," Doria Fernanda with one from "La Favorita," that they were forced to grant repeated encores; when we discovered that the two Junos were just natural, simple girls, full of girlish pleasure at giving pleasure.

Anna Roselle sang the Micaela aria from "Carmen" delightfully, showing in her dramatic delivery of the song the irrepressible instinct of the born actress.

Mario Chamlee, a black-haired Latin of the Latins, in his full, melodious voice sang the pathetic tenor swan song from "La Tosca," throwing in a sob or two—which I think we can dispense with—and then as a contrast delighting the audience with "La donna e mobile."

Greek Evans gave the "Toreador" and the always loved "Mandalay," pleasing, but not quite so mightily as the rest, and there was a "La Gioconda" duet, sung by the two powerful voices of Jeanne Gordon and Francesca Peralta, while Ruth Miller, Doria Fernanda, Mario Chamlee, and Greek Evans gave the "Rigoletto" quartet, the four fine voices pouring out the music with that delightful, youthful spontaneity which was a characteristic of each number.

The popular character of the music was maintained in the orchestra pieces, the opening number, the "William Tell" overture, serving as a sort of appetizer, while the tour de force was the ballet music from "Faust," part of which had to be repeated.

It was a delightful occasion, and as many of the most important artists did not appear,

Our Water Supply

"Water for domestic use was obtained from wells, and for drinking an extra good quality was brought from Sausalito in tanks and sold by the gallon from carts in the street."—San Francisco, 1847-1850, by Eldridge.

San Francisco's present water system grew out of two companies incorporated in 1857 and '58.

While one company was content to bring in a limited supply from Lobos Creek, the other—Spring Valley—set about developing the rich water resources of San Mateo, and later of Alameda County. It was not long before Spring Valley absorbed the other company.

By administrative wisdom and foresight Spring Valley was able to anticipate the rapidly growing water requirements of this city during generations of remarkable expansion.

Engineering skill solved problems of distribution the like of which were not known in other American cities.

The company took its name from Spring Valley, a hollow between Powell and Mason Streets, Washington and Broadway. The springs there yielded 20,000 gallons a day, but were never a part of this city's water supply.

it gives us some idea of the splendid personnel of Signor Scott's general company. JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

George White's "Scandals of 1919" comes to the Columbia for a two weeks' run, commencing with Monday night, October 18th. It has broken box-office records in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago. The production is an elaborate one in sixteen scenes and two acts filled with satirical references to the current news issue of the day. Every variety of dancing, tuneful and catchy music, and an endless chain of hits will make the production one of special interest to those who love elaborate revues. The distinctive cast of comedians, singers, and dancers includes Grace Cameron, Jack Edwards, Duke Rogers, Helen Wilson, the White Way Trio, Blanche Boone, Victor Cranc, James Buckley, Wallace Sharpless, Irene Rogers, Jeanne Collins, Irene Watson, Irene Grey, Fred Cady, Elizabeth Hopkins, and others. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday.

The Curran Theatre.

Messrs. Lee and J. J. Shubert are sending to the Curran Theatre for an engagement of two weeks, commencing Monday night, James McIntyre and Thomas K. Heath, undoubtedly the most famous character comedians in the world. Their vehicle is a big musical extravaganza called "Hello, Alexander," and no excuses are offered for declaring that this work is a legitimate descendant of "The Ham Tree," in which the favorite comedians appeared with astonishing success for several seasons. Heath impersonates the pompous and optimistic Harry Jones, proprietor of the Ever Ready Minstrels, and McIntyre the glib and always hungry Alexander, of lively stable memory. McIntyre and Heath require no introduction to San Francisco playgoers. They have established for themselves places in the annals of the stage quite as secure as the pages earned by Mansfield as Baron Chevalier and Jefferson as Rip Van Winkle through their origination of character types faithful and unique. "Hello, Alexander," has been written by Edgar Smith and Emily M. Young, with lyrics by Alfred Bryan and music, of which there are twenty-one numbers, by Jean Schwartz. The dancing numbers have been staged by Allan K. Foster, and are said to comprehend several entirely new to the stage. The cast of principals is an imposing one, and affords evidence that McIntyre and Heath feel secure in their honors, for among the names of players in their support are those of Homer Dickinson, Gracie Deagon, Vivian Holt, Lillian Rosedale, Mabel Elaine, Dan Quinlan, Earl Rickard, Dorothy Moore, Dan McNeill, Doris Wayne, George Youngman, Phyllis Ray, Arthur Yule, and Chic Barrymore. Matinees will be given on Wednesdays and Saturdays.

The Alcazar Theatre.

The versatility of the New Alcazar company finds striking illustration when it passes next Sunday from the emotional drama, "The Hypocrites," to the mystery thrills of "The Dummy," a comedy-melodrama of detective activities, which ran for an entire season in New York. It is the work of Harriet Ford and Harvey O'Higgins, authors of "The Argyle Case," "On the Hiring Line," and other popular plays. Thrills, mystery, and laughter are blended in depicting the adventures of a New York messenger boy, who is employed by a detective agency to find and protect the child of a divorce-seeking couple who has been kidnapped by crooks. Ben Erway will have fine opportunity in the messenger boy role that Ernest Truex scored in so decisively. Dudley Ayres and Inez Ragan are the misunderstanding couple upon the brink of divorce. Emily Pinter is the humorous, kind-hearted wife of the crook, who has custody of the youngster and is torn between greed and maternal sympathy. Brady Kline is Spider Hart, the master crook, and the cast includes Rafael Brunetto, Henry Shumer, Al Cunningham, Charles Murphy, Frederick Green, Walter Belasco, and other melodramatic experts.

To follow October 24th is the farcical comedy, "Too Many Husbands," that ran all last season at the Booth Theatre, New York, when produced by A. H. Woods. The witty Somerset Maugham is the author. Every hook reader has keenly enjoyed his "The Moon and Sixpence."

The Maitland Playhouse.

Another of George Bernard Shaw's well-known dramas, this time "Mrs. Warren's Profession," is to be presented at the Maitland Playhouse on Stockton Street this coming week by Arthur Maitland and the members of his company.

Arthur Maitland has succeeded in surrounding himself with a cast of professionals that can interpret the plays selected for his theatre. The results of his endeavors are performances pleasing to the ear as well as staged to suit the eye.

Both Arthur Allard and Mildred Cates have made friends for themselves with the Maitland audiences and will be strong favorites as the season progresses.

"The Typhoon," that strong Japanese play made famous by Walker Whiteside, is being produced, with the closing performances for Saturday matinee and evening.

The Orpheum.

Anatol Friedland, known primarily as a popular composer, whose songs have been heard in the far corners of the world, comes as next week's Orpheum headliner with one of the most elaborate revues that ever has graced a vaudeville stage. Anybody and everybody has sung, played, or whistled "My Little Persian Rose," "Dream Girl," "Shades of Night," and the nearly one thousand other hits for which he is responsible. In vaudeville Mr. Friedland is proving as popular as his songs. Each song is acted, has a special setting, with appropriate prelude and a capable company. As principals Mr. Friedland has Sonia De Calve, Lucille Ballantine, Neil Mack, and Violet Weller.

Nelson Story and Elsie Clark should prove phenomenally successful with their entertaining instrumental and singing number, which they bill under the title of "Songs."

"Georgia On Broadway" will be the title of Maude Powers and Vernon Wallace's new act.

Lee Rose and Kathryn Moon will have an effective routine of song and dance. Miss Moon is pretty, dainty, and attractive. Mr. Rose is a dancer of more than usual ability. Between feats Tuck and Clare will joke. Their "Tunes and Twists" is a combination of patter, gymnastics, and contortion.

Charles Henry's pets will be a distinctive act. The feats performed by these dogs are said to be nearly supernatural.

Harry Fox with Beatrice Curtis will remain next week. The one other holdover are the Four Harmony Kings.

"Way Down East."

Through special arrangements made by the management of the Curran Theatre, "Way Down East," D. W. Griffith's screen masterpiece, will open at the Savoy Theatre, Market and McAllister Streets, tomorrow night for a limited engagement.

Since the opening of the seat sale at the Savoy the indications are that "Way Down East" will enjoy all the popularity it had during its fortnight at the Curran. "Way Down East" cost more than $800,000 to produce and occupied a year in filming. The climax of "Way Down East" provides a thrilling rescue of the heroine from the dangers of an ice jam, a scene said to be without peer on stage or screen.

Lillian Gish, Richard Barthelmess, Kate Bruce, Burr McIntosh, Lowell Sherman, Mrs. Morgan Belmont, and other notables of the cinema world make up the cast of "Way Down East."

Symphony Orchestra.

Next Sunday, October 17th, the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra will give its first popular concert in the Curran Theatre, beginning at 2:45 o'clock. The programme consists principally of favorite light classics, although two new numbers will also be included. Of these the "Coppelia" ballet suite of Delibes, while well known to music lovers, has never been played before under Mr. Hertz, as the complete score has not been obtainable. Another new number is the "Aubade" of Luigini, a delightful little piece for woodwinds, French horn, and harp. Other items announced are Weher's overture to "Eury-anthe," Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," the familiar "Wedding March" of Mendelssohn, Liszt's "Love's Dream," and the ever-beautiful "Traumerel" of Schumann. The programme will close with Wagner's Prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin."

On the following Friday and Sunday the second pair of symphony concerts will be given. The symphony announced for these concerts is the D minor of Cesar Franck. It will be followed by the "Mozartiana" suite of Tchaikowsky and Erich Korngold's "Overture to a Drama."

The notable revival of "Rohin Hood" sent on tour by Ralph Dunbar comes to the Columbia Theatre following the George White's "Scandals of 1919." It is said to be an exceptionally well-sung revival of the popular opera.

Among the coming attractions for the Columbia are "Rohin Hood," "Listen Lister," "Tiger Rose," "Three Wise Fools," Robert Mantell.

Bimini, the Fountain of Youth.

It may not be generally known that Bimini, that small West Indian isle so conveniently situated in the Atlantic off the Florida coast, was at one time thought to contain the Fons Juventutis (fountain of youth). It was conquered and explored by the early Spaniards for no other reason than this—they fancied they had learned from the half-understood speech of savages in Hispaniola that the wonderful fountain to drink from which made a young man out of an old one flowed there.

The legend of a fountain of youth had persisted from the first utterance of that lie by that famous liar, Sir John Mandeville, who so successfully hid his identity that nobody knows whether the author of his "Bok" was a man or a syndicate. It has been proved that there was no Sir John Mandeville. Whoever the writer was, he stole the story from Marco Polo, who said he got it from another mythical personage, Prester John. It ran from the twelfth century to the sixteenth, and it may be running yet.

Juan Ponce de Leon, who seems to have disliked the thought of old age, always felt hopeful of finding this fountain on the Asiatic coast, which he thought, like the discoverers before him, was what we now call Florida. He had heard, or thought he had, the Indians talk of a marvelous fount which they located in Bimini, and he sought and obtained permission to go and annex this island to Spain. This was in March, 1513. He explored Bimini carefully, but did not discover the fountain, and then transferred his search to the larger island that he supposed Florida to be.

VANITY FAIR.

At a time when all causes have their champions, when every impoverishment is the signal for a "drive," it seems strange that nothing has yet been done for the poor Hapsburgs. Nearly a hundred members of this ancient family are now in Switzerland as a result of certain European unpleasantnesses of which some faint reflections have appeared in our daily newspapers. Now these Hapsburgs are penniless. From causes that it might be indelicate to indicate they were compelled to leave their homes with precipitation, and to abandon the domains from which they have drawn their revenues for nearly eight hundred years. The censorious will doubtless say that these Hapsburgs should have saved something from their continuous and lucrative incomes, that the proverbial rainy day should have been kept in mind, and that by a little financial prudence they might have saved themselves from the present predicament. That, of course, is true, but then who would have supposed that an eight-hundred-year job would come to an end so suddenly? Which of us would have acted differently under the circumstances? Does it become us to throw stones at the poor Hapsburgs? There is a good deal of breakable glass in our own houses, and we ourselves can hardly be said to have made a fetish of thrift. It would go hard with some of us if we were to lose our jobs as the poor Hapsburgs have lost theirs.

Let there be no recriminations in this matter. Let us lend our shoulders to the task and decide in what way we can best help the Hapsburgs. At the present time they are taking situations in Switzerland, some as governesses, some as maids. There is no mention of the male members of this illustrious family, but we may suppose that they are supervising. Now it is to be feared that the Swiss are lacking in appreciation of the aristocratic benefits thus brought, as it were, to their doors. They have basked under the shadow of royalty for so many years, they have been so hedged in with kings and emperors, that familiarity has brought with it something like contempt. A governess in Switzerland receives the wages of a governess, and she can claim no additional emoluments on the ground that she is also an archduchess. Nor will the imperial purple be allowed in any way to compensate for a certain stupidity for which the Hapsburgs have been justly famed. As a matter of fact the Hapsburg duchess is sometimes in danger of being "fired" for incompetence just as though she were a human being.

Obviously this is a case for American intervention. Our best families have now an opportunity that may not occur again. One might put it on strictly utilitarian grounds by pointing out this possible recruiting ground for the domestic help of which there is so grievous a dearth. But this would seem a waste of good material that might be better employed. After all, there are only about a hundred of these Hapsburgs, and what are they among so many? Probably there is not one among them who can boil an egg, or who would not feel that dusting the piano was an arduous day's work. But surely they might be received as decorative and permanent guests by some of our best families, who would thus have a chance to improve their manners by an intimate study of the best models. The Austrian court was the most aristocratic in the world, and its manners the most perfect. Consider the advantage of having an archduchess about the house, constantly under observation, and always on tap, so to speak, as an arbiter elegantiarum. There would be no further discussion about the intricacies of etiquette. A glance at the archduchess would show us in a moment whether we ought to shuffle the dinner fork from hand to hand or hold it firmly and continuously in the left hand, and how an orange may be eaten with decorum and distinction. She would be a sort of perpetual manual of etiquette and her obiter dicta would be final and unchallengeable. The family so fortunate as to possess a Hapsburg would assume an undisputed rank in the community. It would be regarded as a sort of court of last appeal. It would have atmosphere. The social radiance emitted by its little tame Hapsburg would penetrate from the houndoir, whatever that may be, to the nursery, the schoolroom, and the kitchen. It would mollify and ameliorate, soften and assuage.

The number of Hapsburgs is limited. Thank heaven for that. Excluding those who were lucky enough to carry off enough swag to live upon, there are probably not more than enough to supply the chief cities of America at the rate of one apiece. Those who do not make early application may have to put up with something below the rank of archduchess, a Hapsburg truly enough, but not quite of the crème de la crème. That would be unfortunate and never enough to be deplored. It is true that there are a certain number of German royalties who might be available at a pinch, and while they might shed a certain éclat on the strength of their rank, it might be unwise to regard them as mentors of manners. The Austrian court always held its nose, so to speak, when it was entertaining German royalties, who were never considered as quite to the manner born. Cities of the third and fourth rank might be content with a German princeling or even a Russian, but the larger centres, anxious for real distinction, should make early application and secure a Hapsburg. The supply is limited and no orders received after a certain date can receive attention.

Take it by and large, it must be said that these little grandees have come through their ordeal fairly well. We know some plain, everyday citizens who have made the welkin ring at the loss of their fortunes, raising hands to high heaven in passionate protest against the mysterious judgments of fate. But we have heard no complaints from the Hapsburgs and there have been no complaints from the Russian aristocrats. So far as we have been allowed to know, they have accepted their lot with a certain amount of manfulness that commands respect. They have hunkled down to work and they have done so with dignity. It may easily be that for the first time in their lives they are learning what it is to be happy. Whether their liberated peoples are also on the road to happiness remains to be seen. At the moment they appear, many of them, to have lapsed into a frenzy of barbarism and cruelty far worse than anything ever charged against the Hapsburgs and the Romanoffs. But that of course is of no importance so long as the world is made safe for democracy.

A Paris dispatch to the Sun and New York Herald says that "the American system of holding presidential elections is not favored by French merchants, who are greatly chagrined by the fact that American tourists in France are hastening home to vote. A month ago it was almost impossible to get accommodations in the larger hotels, such as the Ritz, the Crillon, the Grand, and the Rhin, but managers of these places now say they will have no difficulty providing the most elaborate suites after the first week in October, as their American clientèle, with the exception of a few permanent residents, insist they are not going to lose their vote at home."

"Naturally this is hitting the pocket-hooks of the 'de luxe' merchants, who count upon American dollars to rebuild their trade, which was practically at a standstill during the war." Moreover, the exodus of Americans from Paris is apparent as soon as one enters a theatre, a café, or walks along the boulevards, which last month were thronged with American sightseers who yielded to the temptation to see the Parisian risqué productions and partook of the seductive aperitifs.

"Now their clientèle consists of habitués, with the sad-eyed fillettes wondering how long it will be before the generous Westerners returned to restore the cheer in their unprofitable existence."

"On the other hand, the tourist agencies are well pleased, as they look on the home-going Americans as advertisements for French resorts and battlefields. Big firms like the American Express Company, Cook's, and the steamship agencies are crowded daily by persons seeking staterooms in steamships for the United States. As a result of this home-bound rush the price of transportation is soaring sky high, ordinary first-class passage in some cases costing as much as 3500 francs, not counting the tax of 10 per cent. recently imposed by the government on tickets and incidentals, such as steamer chairs, visés of passports, and gratuities."

"Apart from pleasant memories which Americans are taking home with them from France, however, they also are carrying unprecedented quantities of gowns and hats and even men's clothing, which can be purchased here for about half what it costs in New York. One Rue de la Paix milliner admitted that his sales to Americans since last April had exceeded his total sales of 1913. Modistes have reaped an unanticipated harvest, firms like Molyneux, Paquin, Worth, and Mercier reporting recently that they were unable to fill all their orders because of lack of trained employees."

FORTUNES IN FOXES.

Wearers of furs who like to have the hope encouraged that they may continue to wear them (at a price) in spite of the rapidly diminishing supply of suitable fur-bearing wild animals may, perhaps, gain a modified comfort from the following contributed by a correspondent to the London Daily Mail:

"On Prince Edward Island, the smallest province of the Dominion of Canada, black foxes are being reared in captivity for their fur with very great success. Fortunes are being made in a single season, and chartered fox companies pay dividends of from 300 to 400 per cent. annually."

"Black foxes have always been on the island in a wild state, and about the year 1900 a poor farmer thought of securing a pair of black foxes alive and rearing the young ones in captivity. He had marked success and carried on a very profitable business for nearly ten years before it leaked out that he had made a fortune."

"Several men then tried it with startling success; the news became general, and the country went 'fox' mad. Live foxes were in such demand that options were taken on unborn pups, and in 1913 prices ranged from £2400 to £3000 a pair. One proved pair of breeders was sold for £7000, the highest price ever paid."

"Now in 1920 the industry has developed on different lines. Live foxes are not bringing as much as pelts are. The world's supply of fur is growing smaller each year. Russia is out of the market, the Great West of Canada and the United States are being settled and depleted of wild fur-bearing animals, and fur-buyers are turning to Prince Edward Island to supply their ever-increasing demands."

"One usually pictures a ranch as a place of hundreds of acres in extent, but a model fox ranch covers only about three acres of woodland, the whole inclosed within a ten-foot fence of boards on the north and west sides and fine mesh wire on the south and east."

"To the casual observer the wire looks like ordinary chicken wire, but it is really much stronger, as a fox can easily bite through ordinary chicken wire."

"Foxes are great hurrowers, so to prevent them from digging themselves out a trench is dug about two feet deep and two feet wide, and wire is laid along the bottom and up the side, and the trench refilled with earth. This forms a safe fence, because foxes always start to dig at the foot of an obstruction, and in so doing come upon the wire buried in the bottom of the trench."

"In each pen there is a small house, and inside this a large box which serves as the den, to which a curved runway or chute gives the foxes admittance. In this den the young are born, and the mother does not allow them out until they are about three weeks old. During that time the rancher must wait in patience and not attempt to find out how many pups have been born, for if alarmed or disturbed the mother fox kills her young. During the pup season no one is allowed near the ranch except the rancher. When the puppies are about a month old they are quite tame to the rancher, but on the approach of a stranger they will rush to their hiding places."

"The profits in the industry are astounding, but when it is reckoned that a female fox produces a litter of from four to eight pups each year and continues to do so for about eight years it is easily seen how fox companies pay their huge dividends."

Englishmen were men of leisure in the slow-moving seventeenth century, and their gregarious instinct made the coffee houses popular, with new and fashionable rendezvous springing up all over the city. The first known advertisement of coffee in the press occurs in No. 1 of the Public Advertiser for the week of May 26, 1657, and reads quaintly and comprehensively: "In Bartholomew Lane, on the back side of the old exchange, the drink called coffee, which is a very wholesome and physical drink, having many excellent virtues, closes the office of the stomach, fortifies the heat within, helpeth digestion, quickeneth the spirits, making the heart lightsome, is good against eye sores, coughs or cold rhumes, consumption, heartache, dropsy, gout, scurvy, king's evil, and many others, is to be sold in the morning and at 3 o'clock in the afternoons." In 1662, Pepy's Diary, that bottomless mine of information about manners, tells that Charles II, attended by the Duke of York and suite, were present at the acting of a play called "Tango's Wiles," or "The Coffee House," which the diarist curtly criticises as "the most ridiculous and insipid play I ever saw in my life."

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A Scot was taken out of the train at Willesden for being drunk and disorderly. He had got into bad company, he said. "Bad company—how?" the magistrate asked. "Well, sir, ye see, I had two hoattles o' speerits in ma hag, an' a' the ither men in ma compairtment wis teetotal."

Walter and Harry, the twins, were saying their prayers. After they had finished Walter exclaimed: "Mamma, I don't want Harry to say his prayers when I do." "Why not, Walter?" asked his mother. "Because," he replied, "how do you 'spec' God can hear us both at the same time."

"Mamma," asked seven-year-old Charles, who was studying the Bible lesson, "what is the difference between high church and low church?" "I know," exclaimed his little five-year-old sister. "Well, what's the difference?" asked their mother. "One says 'Awmen' and the other says 'Amen,'" she replied.

"Well, professor," inquired the young musician, "how do my compositions please you?" "Why, I think," responded the older man, "that they may perhaps be played when Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, and Meyerbeer have been forgotten." "Really?" exclaimed the young musician in ecstasy. "Certainly, but not till then," remarked the other.

Harry Carey, the picture star, is about as affable a chap as one would care to meet, but once in awhile he does get peeved, and this is most likely to occur when the company is on location and is in a hurry to get the work done and return to the studio. Not so long ago the Carey company was on location in the north country, but instead of finding sunny weather it was cold and cloudy. This was bad enough, but the explosion came in the tiny restaurant when the chatty waiter remarked: "The rain will be here in a minute or two, sir." "Who'n'ell wants rain!" thundered Carey. "I didn't order any. I'm waiting for eggs—sunny side up!"

The children in the Sunday-school class were getting restless, and the teacher, to divert them, asked all who wished to go to heaven to stand up. All rose except one little girl. "Don't you want to go to heaven, Jennie?" asked the teacher. "Yes'm," was the response, "but I know mother doesn't want me to go just yet."

Johnny and Jimmy were at a party and being away in a corner at supper-time, they were not looked after very well. They managed to get some jelly and bread and butter, but no spoons. "How shall we eat our jelly?" asked Jimmy. "Balance it on your bread and butter," said Johnny. "I tried that," retorted Jimmy, "but it won't stay on; it's too nervous."

In spite of the fact that there was a notice on the gate—"No Admittance Except on Business"—a hoy one day entered a timber yard and stood gazing round him when the foreman approached and asked what he was doing there. The youth replied, "I'm just looking 'round." "But," said the foreman, "there's nothing to see." "No," said the youth, as he quietly walked away, "but there's a lot to saw."

The conversation around the long dinner-table ended, as do most conversations nowadays, with the subject of spiritualism. The guests and the members of the family gave their opinions as to whether or not the dead could communicate with the living, but it remained for "Sweet Sixteen" to present the only original thought on the subject. "It's hard enough for me now to keep up my correspondence," she said. "When I die I want a rest."

A motorist had been haled into court and when his name was called the judge asked what the charges were against the prisoner. "Suspicious actions, your honor," answered the policeman who had made the arrest. "Suspicious actions?" queried his honor. "What was he doing that he seemed suspicious?" "Well," replied the officer, "he was running within the speed limit, sounding his horn properly, and trying to keep on the right side of the street, so I arrested him."

Before the army draft blew Sam Johnson away from his pleasant job as chauffeur in Jackson, Mississippi, that city represented to him all that was metropolitan. Sam came back not many weeks ago from a tour of duty in a labor battalion in France, however, with new standards of comparison. His employer, questioning him about his travels, asked him how he liked New York. "Well, boss," he said, "I don't like New York so much. Hit aint nothing like Jackson." He paused a moment and added, "But Paris, now, Paris hit do favor Jackson."

Things are altered nowadays, aren't they? And people have altered with them, as one householder recently found out. Hearing a suspicious noise in the middle of the night, he stole downstairs and found a burglar husily collecting spoons and things in the dining-room. "Look here!" roared the master of the establishment, fiercely. "What are you doing in my house?" "Your house?" retorted the midnight visitor coolly. "Is it your house? I thought you only rented it." "So I do!" exclaimed the other, taken by surprise. "But—" "Well, don't be so high and mighty, talking about your house," snapped the burglar, as he opened the front door and stepped out into the darkness. "Good-night."

"There isn't much I don't know about the English language," boasted the long-haired man in the club. "I'll test you," a friend picked him up quickly. "I'll dictate a paragraph to you." With an assured air the hoaster seized his pencil, but his jaw dropped as he heard: "As Hugh Hughes was hewing a yule log from a yew tree a man dressed in clothes of a dark hue came up to Hugh and said: 'Have you seen my ewes?' 'If you will wait until I hew this yew tree I will go with you anywhere in Europe to look for your ewes,' said Hugh."

P. G. Wodehouse, the novelist and wit, was talking about the Anti-Tobacco League. "They have taken our wine and our beer away from us," he said, "and they threaten to take away our tobacco. The modern woman, however, will walk there. An anti-tobacco friend talked so eloquently at the house of a friend of mine the other day that a young municipal reformer rose and said solemnly: 'My wife gave me a box of a hundred magnificent Egyptian cigarettes last night. I smoked one of them, but I now see so clearly the evil of smoking that I am going to go straight home and throw the rest into the fire.' The reformer's young wife then rose in her turn. 'I'll go home with him,' she said and added, smiling brightly on the assembled guests: 'My intention is to rescue the ninety and nine.'"

THE MERRY MUSE.

The Painful Earth.

What a horrible world it is getting to be—
Nothing but cranks and "efficiency"!
Nothing for fun
In the world is done,
But each solemn fool
Has some brand new rule
For putting the sad old earth to school.

The prig and the prude and the ass eugenic
Turn all to class-room or to clinic,
And woe to him
With no purpose grim,
But who dares to play,
In this serious day,
And laugh and grow fat in the kind old way!

With hutton and hadge and with uniform,
The hushoddes strut and swarm,
And poke and pry,
With prurient eye,
Lest too gay the dance,
Or the new romance
Be too much like what they read in France.

To take the laugh out of human laughter
Is what these solemn owls are after;
It's up to you,
Or they'll take it too,
And one by one
All our joys be gone,
The way of the grape and the mastodon.

—Richard Le Gallienne in Judge.

Romance.

Far, by a sunlit, summer sea
She dwelt on love and faith and hope—
Her right name was Penelope
But neighbors called her Penelope.

Fair as a violet was she,
That grows beside the mossy stone,
Or that wind-flower, anemone—
The farmers call it anemone.

She danced like down along the lea,
She danced like foam along the shore,
A daughter of Terpsichore—
Whom hoi polloi call Terpsichore.

Alas! One day she went to see
A circus—heard the raucous dope
Of that accursed callopie
Which most folks call the callopie!

That very night this maid did flee
With the Big Show to dance and loaf;
Sure, such a sad catastrophe
Might well be called a catastrophe!

Now as a modern trovatore
She dances to the callopie;
O hapless child of Terpsichore,
O airy, fairy Penelope!

An Old Business Sale.

An almost forgotten word and a business long ago abandoned in America are brought to mind by the sale of the Tontine Building reported in the real estate transactions in New York City recently. It stands at the intersection of Wall and Water Streets, a substantial twelve-story structure that some two decades ago replaced the original Tontine Building, built about 1794, which for generations was a centre of the commercial and shipping life of the city.

In a period when life insurance was a good deal of a gamble tontine was immensely popular, and correspondingly profitable for the companies that sold it. A policy had no "surrender value." The gain accruing from lapsed policies was supposed to be passed to the credit of the other insured persons—and lapsed policies were the rule rather than the exception. The arrangement was adapted from the original tontine scheme practiced even by governments in the finance of the Middle Ages, in which several persons agreed to contribute to a pool, the last survivor taking all. The "deferred dividend" plan followed the tontine method of insurance, but as came out in the Hughes investigation, this proved to be a gamble hardly more advantageous to the average policyholder than the old form—in the course of the revelations it was characterized as a "solemn fraud."

"This line in your hand," said the girl who had studied palmistry, "indicates that you have a brilliant future before you." "Is that so?" queried the dense young man. "Yes," continued the maid, "but this other line indicates that you are too slow ever to overtake it."—Boston Transcript.

Her guests were Miss Calla Hale, Miss Helen Foster, Miss Lorna Williamson, Miss Frances Murphy, Miss Katherine Murphy, Mr. John Hale of Marysville, Mr. J. Almada, Mr. William Veach, Mr. Gerald Hardy, and Mr. Robert Rathbun.

Miss Elizabeth Ashe gave a supper Tuesday evening, complimenting Mrs. John Phillips of Boston.

Pianologue-Tea

Hotel Whitcomb announces a "Pianologue Tea" for Tuesday afternoon, October 19th, in the picturesque Sun Lounge.

True descendant of the ballads that strolling singers sang in the middle ages, the pianologue has many charms for the listener. Perhaps this is because, like the old ballads, it is naive or subtle, sublime or humorous, but always close to the heart in its appeal and simplicity.

Seated at the piano on the occasion of this "Pianologue Tea" will be an artist whose work is rich with the surprise and variety of the unexpected both in recitation and melody. Mildred Aronz has earned an enviable reputation for her delightful pianologue entertainment. From 2:30 to 4:30 Miss Aronz will render some of her choicest selections for the pleasure of Hotel Whitcomb's guests.

Captain Bairnsfather.

Paul Elder is bringing Captain Bairnsfather, world-renowned humorist and cartoonist, author of "The Better 'Ole," to San Francisco to entertain San Franciscan and Oakland audiences with his inimitable sketches and wit. Instead of the conventional lectures, Bairnsfather will simply talk about the humorous side of some interesting topics of the day, and as a speaker he displays the same genius that is apparent in his cartoons. To illustrate his remarks he will draw humorous sketches on the stage and some of his best-known cartoons will be thrown on a screen. Elder announces that he will speak in San Francisco at the Scottish Rite Auditorium, Thursday evening, December 2d, and at the Oakland Auditorium, Friday evening, December 3d.

Alexander M. Robertson.

Alexander M. Robertson's fiftieth year of bookselling and publishing in San Francisco is to be celebrated at a dinner given in his honor by the Booksellers' Association of San Francisco Bay Counties on the evening of October 30th, at 7 o'clock, at the Palm Room of the Hotel Bellevue, No. 505 Geary Street, San Francisco.

Robertson was publisher for Amrose Bierce, Joaquin Miller, Louis Alexander Robertson, Peter Robertson, Charles Warren Stoddard, Daniel O'Connell, and other writers who were Californians by birth or adoption.

Tea Series Popular.

Wonderful romances, future heiresses, reunions, and all sorts of great adventures were discovered on Tuesday afternoon at the fortune-telling tea held in the Sun Lounge of the Hotel Whitcomb. This is the third of the popular series of original teas which the Hotel Whitcomb is giving every Tuesday afternoon.

According to the Dry Goods Economist, Miss Sarah Moulton, member of an old and respected family, was the first saleswoman in America and her employment in the early '60s by Benjamin Franklin Hamilton in his store in Saco, Maine, aroused so much indignation that the Hamilton establishment was boycotted. The Economist is in error, declares Richard Spillane in the Philadelphia Public Ledger. Long before Sarah Moulton was born; in fact, before George Washington was elected President a saleswoman was behind the counter in a little shop in what now is Park Row, New York, not far from the present site of the Tribune Building. She sold cookies and all sorts of odds and ends, while her husband, with whom she had come from Germany, bought pelts from trappers and laid the foundation for one of the largest fortunes in America. She was not boycotted, and neither was her husband, so far as history discloses, for she was Mrs. John Jacob Astor the first. And probably there were some saleswomen who antedated Mrs. Astor in American business.

A young Norwegian of Washington, D. C., formerly in the United States army, sought naturalization recently, but could get no one to identify him. Then he thought of his finger-print record at the War Department, and this soon got him his citizenship.

Problems That Can Be Helped

Too many persons know advertising only as a means of spending a lot of money, carrying a name before the public and otherwise clamoring to make known.

Far greater than these efforts is the assistance that can be given in organization plans, finding the men you need, laying out stationery, etc. Let us work with you on any of your problems. You get the benefit of the other fellow's viewpoint, and this is often of considerable help. No charge unless you get what you want.

KEEPING CHIEFS FRIENDLY.

By her successful protection of the caravan routes France has earned the gratitude of the people of the regions that border on the great Sahara. Many of these great trade caravans are literally moving cities. They sometimes consist of 12,000 camels, to say nothing of horses, donkeys, sheep, and goats.

As showing the constant effort that the French officials make to establish friendly relations with the natives it may be mentioned that several times each year the commandants of the French posts along the edge of the Sahara organize fantasias in honor of the Arab sheiks of the region. The sheiks come in to attend them, followed by great retinues of turbaned and splendidly mounted retainers, and with the same enthusiasm with which an American countryside turns out to see the circus.

Races with valuable money prizes are arranged for the visitors' horses, and before the sheiks leave they are presented with ornate saddles, gold-mounted rifles, and sometimes with crosses of the Legion of Honor.

In return for this hospitality they willingly agree to capture and surrender certain fugitives from justice, to warn the more lawless of their tribesmen that the plundering of caravans must cease, to furnish quotas of recruits for the native cavalry and to send in for sale to the remount department a large number of desert-bred horses. Most important of all, they go back to their tented homes in the desert immensely impressed with the power and the generosity of France.

Not content with these manifestations of friendship, the French government makes it a point to invite the native rulers of the lands under its control to visit France occasionally as the guests of the nation. Escorted by French officers who can talk to them in their own tongue, these colonial visitors in their outlandish costumes experience the delights of Paris, are dined by the president of the republic at the Elysée Palace, receive the freedom of the city at the Hotel de Ville and finally return to their own lands friends and allies of France for the rest of their lives.

By a network of small oasis garrisons and desert patrols, recruited from the desert tribes and mounted on the tall, swift trotting camels known as mehari, France has made the Saharan trade routes, if not as safe as Fifth Avenue or Piccadilly, certainly very much safer for the lone traveler than certain streets of Chicago and Paris.

It has long been the fashion to hold up the Northwest Mounted Police as the model for all constabulary forces, just as it has been the fashion to extol the English as the model colonizers, but when you consider the smallness of their numbers, the vastness of the region which they control, and the character of the climate and its inhabitants, it is contended that the blue ribbon in this regard

The Japanese and the Land.

Regarded practically, nothing could be more futile than to protest the pending measure relative to alien (Japanese) ownership of land to come before the voters of California in the forthcoming election. Public sentiment is all one way. The affirmative vote will probably register in the ratio of ten to one. Public sentiment, too, has the rights of the case. There are many reasons why the lands of California should not be permitted to pass into the hands of an unassimilable race. None the less we are going at a right thing in a wrong way. The matter is properly one that should be determined, not by state action, but by the national government. That the situation is what it is—that we are in the way of action tending to make ill feeling where ill feeling is not necessary—is due to the dereliction of the Washington administration. If Secretary Colby or the President had given any kind of assurance of a prompt and thoroughgoing course California would patiently have waited. It is because the Washington authorities have fumbled with the question and failed to satisfy the just demand of California that local sentiment here has been aroused to the point of independent action. Mr. Phelan's personal politics, too, has had a sinister part in creating the present unfortunate condition. His party has been in control of the government during the larger portion of his senatorial service.

Mr. Phelan did nothing in the matter of Japanese immigration. It is only now, in connection with his campaign for reelection, that he has become active, even though the conditions are such that his activity is practically meaningless as tending to definite results. If anything is to be done by the national government it must be by the new administration, which by every omen is destined to be under the Republican party. Thus it is to the Republican party that California must look for relief; and the logic of the situation is that California should send to the Senate the Republican candidate, Mr. Shortridge.

The British Strike.

The significance of the British coal miners' strike becomes apparent only when it is regarded in perspective. This calls for a back-look. British industry has long been sustained upon a basis of cheap labor. The rule has been universal in its application. It has made cheap goods and it has carried them to the ends of the earth in successful competition with countries like our own where labor is better paid. The industry upon which every other industry depends is that of coal mining. Coal, regarded as a reservoir of power, has been and continues to be the motive force in the life of the country, the first essential factor in its activities—in brief, the foundation of all material things. There is not an industry in Britain, barring that of a limited agriculture, that is not dependent upon coal. Ocean commerce is likewise dependent upon coal. There is no phase of British life that is not dependent upon coal. That there should be prosperity in British industry and comfort in British life it has been deemed necessary to hold down the price of coal; and to this end wages and all else entering into the cost of coal have been subjected to the severest grinding-down process. In this industry, the very cornerstone of national welfare, wages have been lower, conditions of labor harder, the general status of things narrower, than in any other department of British life.

Prior to 1914 there had been on the part of British industry in general, and more particularly on the part of mine workers, a sense of inequities involved in the relatively low rates of labor as against the relatively high profits of commerce. If labor was not precisely ready for a revolt, it had reached the degrees of understanding and resentment that precede revolt, due to the fact that its efforts have yielded only a bare subsistence upon narrow standards of living, and allowing small provision or none at all for old age. Upon this situation the war came. And with it the need of speeding up every British industry, particularly coal mining, upon which every other activity was dependent. The draft upon the coal mines was enormously increased to support the munition industries, to transport troops, and, above all, to keep the immense defensive Allied fleet upon the sea. It became necessary, too, to supply countries—notably France and Italy—which had previously drawn their fuel either from domestic fields or from Germany. To support the activities essential under the war conditions wages in every sphere were largely augmented. In coal mining the wage rate was more than doubled, and special bonuses were added to stimulate output. For the full period of the war coal mining, along with many other things, enjoyed advantages never before experienced or dreamed of.

When the war ended there came back to their homes large numbers of men, including many thousands of coal miners, who in their war experiences had gained wider views of things, and whose ideas of individual opportunity had been vastly enlarged. To the forces of organized labor into which they entered they gave new aims, new ambitions, new spirit. Today the position of labor in Britain is far different from what it was before the war. It is no longer content with conditions as they were formerly. It demands higher wages, shorter hours, advanced standards of living. It declines to be sweated in the interest of production and commerce. It sees no advantage in British predominance in industry if such advantage must be sustained at the cost of the laboring masses—a cost reflected in the lowest endurable standards of living.

Very early last year—1919—organizations representing the coal miners of Great Britain formulated a series of demands and put them up to the government. They included something like double the wages paid before the war, shorter hours of labor, better housing, better school facilities for children, efficient organization of medical service, etc. To give greater force to these demands the coal miners entered into alliance with the transportation (railway) workers and with the "dockers," a strong organization of what we would call longshoremen and water-front workers. As thus organized, the combination became immensely potent. It could have shut down every factory, stopped every wheel, tied up every ship. It could have starved England in a month, and it threatened to do it unless concessions should be made. The government, while it did not lose its head, was aroused. In a series of conferences it pledged investigation and reasonable concession, and upon this understanding the men, who in large numbers had quit work, took up their tools again. The demands thus presented a year and a half ago have been under investigation and consideration. There has been some concession, but there has been no general adjustment satisfactory to the coal miners. In the meantime they have become angry and sullen, and although paid increased wages for shorter hours of work have ceased to put forth the old productive energy. Reports vary as to the decline of efficiency, but in one measure or another it is universal. The demands upon which the present strike is based include wage rates and conditions that will advance the price of coal to something like double the old price. It would of course vastly burden the industries of the country and it may make many forms of manufacture impracticable. It will surely lay a heavy hand upon overseas commerce, since it must largely increase the cost of operating steamships. The government has proposed to yield at most points, provided the men will engage to maintain old-time standards of production—in other words, if they will give an efficient day's labor for a day's pay. To this the men will not agree. They present their demands, offering no assurances, and declare that they will not return to work until all are granted.

The situation is serious enough, but there is the menace of a still more serious condition if the transport workers and the "dockers," whose sympathies were with the miners last year, shall again coöperate with them. Up to the latest reports—we write on Wednesday—the transport workers and "dockers" have held aloof, under what inspiration we may only guess, since no statements covering the point have been made. Presumably they are loath to join in a movement that would imply a tie-up of all industry—nothing less than a national calamity.

The homogeneity and the discipline of the British race, in conjunction with its basic common sense, have pulled it through many a crisis and it will assuredly find a way out of this one. But conditions are not what they were and they will never again be what they were. British labor will not accept that which has been its portion in times past. It will not yield its energies under conditions that have held it to merely endurable standards of life. The national energies, including commerce, will have to adjust themselves to a basis of higher costs with better social conditions of labor, even though in the process something—or very much—be lost to the national prestige in industry and commerce.

The Issue of Vivisection.

In the matter of the anti-vivisection measure now before the voters of the state there is instruction in what the baseball world styles the "line-up." On the affirmative side we find a very considerable number of humanely-inspired persons, mostly women, who view the issue sentimentally and, we suspect, without serious study of all its phases. In the name of mercy they appeal for a law to prevent experimental practice upon living organisms in the name of science. They insist that there is no value in pathological or physiological experiments on living animals, and that nothing that could not otherwise be learned has ever been derived from vivisection. They allege that gross cruelties are practiced in laboratories of the state in the name of science and that these acts have a debasing effect alike upon experimenters and upon students under their instruction.

On the other side of the issue we find the highest authority in medical science. The medical fraternity is practically unanimous in opposition to the measure. It insists that the notable advance in modern sanitation and modern medicine and physiology has rested upon animal experimentation. It cites that without the knowledge gained through vivisection it would not have been possible to make the progress illustrated in modern practice against the scourges of smallpox, typhus, typhoid, cholera, diphtheria, plague, yellow fever, malaria, and other diseases not so prevalent and fatal. Modern surgical operations, it is declared, and the protection of mothers from child-bed fever would be impossible but for experiments on animals. It is further argued that the measure is unnecessary special legislation urged upon prejudice and misinformation. It is pointed out that the existing laws of California are sufficient to control any abuse. It is denied that cruelty to animals is practiced in the laboratories of the state. It is alleged that anaesthetics are always used upon animals in the laboratories in exactly the same way that they are used by surgeons in the operating room. These statements are made upon the highest authority.

Scientific experts, representing the medical profession, make appeal for veto of this anti-vivisection measure. They insist that it relates to the welfare of the state in the broadest sense. Much, they declare, has been learned of the causes of disease and disease processes, but much remains to be learned. If there is to be understanding and control of many forms of heart and kidney diseases, diabetes, cancer, tuberculosis, and nervous diseases there must be continued experimentation. If we are to have trained physicians and surgeons there must be permission to observe processes and conditions that can only be developed by laboratory instruction in connection with living animals.

The weight of authority is clearly on the side of those who oppose this measure. It is apparently a case in which a mistaken but kindly sentiment stands against scientific judgment and the dictates of common sense.

The Issue in Nevada.

The arguments that support the candidacy of Mr. Shortridge in California apply with identical force to the candidacy of Mr. Oddie in Nevada. In all human likelihood Senator Harding is to be President of the United States after the 4th of March. If his administration is to be effective in correcting faults and reforming abuses that are only too patent he must have the aid of a supporting Senate. The Republican margin in the Senate now is at the vanishing point. If in the forthcoming election the Democratic party should hold the majority then Mr. Harding's hands would be tied. It is not too much to say that his election would be all but meaningless as related to constructive reforms. The national government would be a house divided against itself.

Nevada is represented in the Senate by a Democrat, Mr. Henderson, who is a candidate for reelection. In her own interests, more important still in support of the Harding administration, Nevada should substitute Mr. Oddie for Mr. Henderson. Many citizens of Nevada, whose votes ought to count in the coming election, are now in California on errands of business or under other motives. All such owe it to their state and to the coming administration to go home and cast their votes for Mr. Oddie. It is due that every influence that may possibly be exercised in behalf of Mr. Oddie should find energetic and prompt expression. The issue is of tremendous importance. The balance of votes in Nevada is narrow. No man who has a vote or who may influence a vote has the moral right to be neglectful of what is plainly a serious duty.

Fresh Demands for Enforcement of Prohibition.

Upon the frank admission that enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment is not effective, "particularly in communities not in sympathy with the law," the Enforcement Bureau has prepared a series of requisitions to be put up to Congress. Demand will be made:

(1) For an increase of approximately 100 per cent. in the appropriation for enforcement. The appropriation for the current year under which the bureau is now working was for $4,500,000. If the demand shall be granted the next appropriation will be for approximately $9,000,000.

(2) For an increase in the personnel of the field force of practically 100 per cent. At the present time the bureau has in its service 1800 men and women. If the new demand shall be granted the force will be increased to 3600.

(3) For purchase by the government of all the whisky now in bond, to the end that it may be dispensed under more rigid rules. The amount of whisky in bond is approximately fifty millions of gallons. Its value would have to be determined; and it is presumable that those who hold it would demand current prices. At this rate fifty million gallons of whisky at wholesale would be worth approximately three hundred millions of dollars.

(4) For legislation limiting the number of concerns permitted to purchase liquor at wholesale. This would open the door to the multiplied abuses of favoritism. Political considerations would inevitably figure in disposal of licenses and thus make a new and colossal scandal.

(5) For amendment to the Volstead Act, taking enforcement machinery entirely out of the hands of local authority and placing the power to make appointments in the hands of officials at Washington. The effect of this would be to add enormously to the machinery of administration politics.

(6) For heavier penalties for the illicit manufacture of liquor. This would call for enlarged addition to the personnel of the forces at the hands of the revenue office and could not fail to work out in many forms of scandal.

(7) For passport regulations, designed to make the operation of bootleggers across the Canadian and Mexican borders impossible. This would mean the imposition of annoying and expensive restrictions upon all travel between this country and Canada on the north and with Mexico on the south. It would subject the millions whose occasions now require them to pass beyond the national boundaries to annoying and expensive formalities, and it could not fail to work out in limitation of legitimate international trade both north and south.

It is possible that the next Congress may be as timid and subservient as was the last, but we doubt it. The Volstead Act was carried, not upon conviction of its propriety, but through fear of political reprisals. Time has demonstrated to the members of Congress that the sentiment of the country is not favorable to prohibition in its radical forms. It has also shown that there are political hazards the other way round. All this being true, the proposed legislation is likely to encounter a less subservient state of mind in Congress.

We venture the prophecy that Congress will not double the appropriation for enforcement, that it will not augment the forces of spies and busybodies under the prohibition bureau, that it will not authorize the expenditure of three hundred millions of dollars to set up the government in the whisky business, that it will not create a situation in which some dealers shall be penalized in the interests of others, that it will not centralize the machinery of enforcement at Washington, that it will not place heavier penalties upon the manufacture of liquor, that it will not further burden the traveler with new and onerous passport regulations.

Editorial Notes.

Hard upon the ending of the grape harvest comes announcement from Washington that a "ruling" has been made under which, without license or payment of a fee, two hundred gallons of wine may be made by anybody for family consumption. True, the grape harvest is ended and the product disposed of, but the announcement comes in time to be helpful in turning the Italian vote of California toward the candidate of the party by whose authority the concession has been made. The politics of it is a bit crude, but there is no reason why it should not be effective—unless our Italian friends are able to distinguish a hawk from a handsaw.

We have heard a good deal in times past, and continue from time to time to hear much, of "judge-made law." Whatever may be the grievance associated with this method of law-making, it is not more subject to criticism than a system very much in vogue at Washington in connection with the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act. It is a cold, dull week when we do not have some modification or interpretation by departmental authority. On the whole we believe the intelligent part of the public would prefer law made by judges who know something of legal principles than by department clerks.

There is embittered outcry on the part of the Prohibition Enforcement Bureau that its work is a failure because so many of its agents turn out to be scoundrels open to bribery. It is undoubtedly true that a very large proportion of the spies and busybodies now in the service are bribable. What else could be expected? Does anybody suppose for a moment that men can be had for this service who are not bribable? Clean, high-minded and uncorruptible men are not subject to employment in the kind of work the Enforcement Bureau has in hand.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

OUT OF HIS OWN MOUTH.

Review of Governor Cox's Utterances in His "Swing Around the Circle."

SAN FRANCISCO, September 15, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir:

Though I be righteous, mine own mouth shall condemn me: Though I be perfect, it shall prove me perverse.

On July 9th, following his now celebrated interview with President Wilson, Governor Cox made the following statement:

"We agreed to the meaning and sufficiency of the Democratic platform and the duty of the party in the face of the threatened had faith to the world in the name of America."

The Democratic nominee having by this interpretation reduced the power of the Senate to function under the Constitution to the originality and initiative of a rubber stamp, the Democratic President stepped cheerfully to centre and gave a Wilsonian direction to Governor Cox's pronouncement:

"I found that he" [Governor Cox], caroled the President, "and I were absolutely at one with regard to the great issue, the league of nations."

Now the Democratic overlord of Ohio would just as soon he killed for a sheep as a lamb, so in his letter of acceptance on August 7th he put everything he had on the ball and swallowed that "at one" whole by emphatically stating of the league, "As the Democratic candidate I favor going in," and of the treaty, "The first duty of the new administration clearly will be the ratification of the treaty."

With the campaign in swing Governor Cox now began to still further ascend those lofty heights of altruism and idealistic thought upon which the President has assured us they stood "absolutely at one" by giving his interpretation of our duty under Article X.

At South Bend, Indiana, on August 20th, Governor Cox said:

"The Republican leaders will know just how close I am to the truth when I say that the minimum fund demanded is $15,000,000."

At Canton, Ohio, on August 22d, still pursuing this lofty line of interpretative though not original argument, he stated: "If by silence they [the Republicans] admit their guilt, the evidence will be produced."

In the meantime, however, the Honorable Franklin Delano Roosevelt had been doing a little league interpreting of his own at Butte, Montana, on August 18th:

"As a matter of fact," quoth the shy and modest F. D., "the United States has about twelve votes in the assembly. Until last week I had two of them myself and now Secretary Daniels has them. You know I have had something to do with the running of a couple of little republics. The facts are that I wrote Haiti's constitution, and if I do say it I think it is a pretty good constitution."

Shades of Sairey Gamp and "Tim" Campbell's, "What's the Constitution between friends?"

Lest the proletariat might not understand the twelve votes thus generously given us F. D. explained that Haiti, Santo Domingo, Cuba, and Panama, and the republics of Central America would give their free and independent votes in the assembly to the United States or some one would know the reason why.

For some occult reason known only to himself Mr. Roosevelt did not include either Mexico or Japan in his roster of our future assembly votes.

When word of F. D.'s interpretation reached him Governor Cox evidently felt that when it came to explaining the league Mr. Roosevelt's mind did not run with his and decided to dispose of the explaining at one fell swoop, and so in Pittsburgh on August 26th he shot the works and spent a full three hours producing his proofs of Republican corruption.

For some reason these proofs didn't seem to register as high in convincing contents as did those of the justly celebrated fifty-one barrels which had helped him to the nomination in San Francisco, so Governor Cox at New Haven the next day produced for a couple of hours more.

F. D. on the Pacific Coast, however, had a bunch that if he would heat the barrier with what he had left of lucid explanation of the league he'd better get busy, so at the St. Francis on August 23d he had told the world that:

"The tariff as an issue in the campaign is a joke. I hadn't planned mentioning it in my speeches, but I never know when I get up to speak what I am going to say."

Colonel Harvey insists that in this last sentence is to be found the most convincing proof that "many a true word is spoken in jest" that has ever been advanced.

In obedience to the dictates of good taste at the Ohio State Fair on September 1st Governor Cox abandoned politics and the league and confined himself to agricultural problems.

"The gentleman who spent eight months in Germany," elucidated the governor, "told me that just as soon as the indemnity was allotted Germany would go back to work."

This masterly exposition of intensive farming refers to the treaty of peace signed by President Wilson at Versailles and in which after taking away from Germany about one-half of the $65,000,000,000 that she possibly possessed when she signed the armistice, then further obligated Germany to give to the Allies $25,000,000,000 in bonds to be redeemed out of Germany's future earnings. If Germany should ever succeed in redeeming these bonds the Reparation Commission was authorized that "further issues by way of acknowledgment and security may be required [from Germany] as the commission determines from time to time."

At Battle Creek, Michigan, on September 4th, Governor Cox made a masterly answer to a question about the league: "You and your kind," insisted the governor, "and Lodge and his kind glorified the sickness of President Wilson."

At Walla Walla, Washington, on the 11th, the production at Pittsburgh apparently not having attained the hope-for popularity, the governor added to its dialogue "the present symptoms strongly indicate that somebody ought to be sent to the penitentiary."

In medical parlance Will H. Hays was strongly indicated.

At this juncture a firm and helping hand was held out to Governor Cox. His explanations of the covenant had so clarified the understanding of the voters that "Maine went bell bent" by over 65,000 majority Republican.

At Boise, Idaho, on the 14th, after stating that "the result in Maine is no surprise," the governor again produced and made the Republican ante $30,000,000 instead of the original and heggarily fifteen millions.

At Oakland, on the 18th, in dealing with the dual navy yard problem in San Francisco Bay, the governor made answer as to whether he was for "America First."

"Germany first," thundered Governor Cox patriotically, "was the slogan of the Kaiser." To he for America first is to conspire "to create racial hatred and differences."

Without the additional dotting of an i or crossing of a t this literally translates into unqualified approval of the hyphen and the advocacy of other allegiance than that owed by the American people to the government of the United States under the Constitution.

At San Diego, on the 20th, Governor Cox again and instructively drew on his experience as a farmer as follows:

"If Senator Newberry hadn't been put on the Foreign Relations Committee by Henry Cahot Lodge we would have had a league of nations."

"I am for a tariff on lemons and made a speech in favor of a tariff on lemons in Congress in 1909."

This and what follows is reminiscent of a Maine farmer who supplied his better half with a lemonade heavily lined with arsenic. When the lady set down the glass half emptied he stirred up the contents and again handed it to her with the remark, "The best's at the bottom, my dear."

The best was indeed at the bottom, for the governor then assures his hearers that "the Monroe Doctrine is safeguarded by the Hitchcock reservations."

This is distinctly an item of news, since the great leader of the Democrats (whom Governor Cox himself has assured us that when he is translated will at once step into a niche alongside of Jefferson and Lincoln) has always insisted that the covenant not only absolutely safeguarded the Monroe Doctrine, but actually strengthened it as well by according it international recognition.

On September 21st the Republican National Committee pointed out, first, that Governor Cox had never mentioned lemons while in Congress, and second, that Senator Newberry had never been a member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

The 22d and 23d were mainly devoted by Governor Cox to explaining what he really had meant in his San Diego speech.

By the 24th, at Puchito, the governor was, however, in form again and charged Hays with sending so-called "scouts" ahead to queer his speeches with the newspapers, and for full measure charged his opponents with "preaching a creed of hate."

On the 27th, at Cheyenne, he charged Senator Harding with being "a brewer who is apologizing for his holdings." Senator Harding once owned two shares of stock in a brewery in Marion which he originally subscribed for in promotion of a local industry.

During the remainder of his tour Governor Cox added to his constant and unsupported charges of Republican corruption, charges against Palmer and Burleson for their administration of the justice and postoffice departments, and at Wichita answered a query with, "My friend, Wilson isn't running for President this year. Cox is running for President."

"I charge! I charge! I charge!" has so interlarded his every speech that Governor Cox may he said to have charged across the country and back again in similar manner and with identical results to those attained by the famous ten thousand men that the noble Duke of York marched up the hill one day—and then marched them down again.

To charge is delightful, easy, and so convenient, but when on November 2d the collector calls on Governor Cox with his little hill it will prove another and a sadly different story.

"You need not be told," said Abraham Lincoln in his historic speech at Cooper Union in 1860, "that persisting in a charge which one does not know to be true is simply a malicious slander."

A Word of Appreciation.

DEL CARMEN, PAMPANGA, P. I., September 14, 1920.

ARGONAUT PUBLISHING COMPANY—Gentlemen: Enclosed you will find my personal check for $10 covering the renewal of my subscription to the Argonaut for two years.

I have been an interested reader of your paper for nearly twenty years and have been happy to count myself a subscriber for the past twelve. Your attitude on public questions always appears to me to be the correct one and your "progressive-conservatism" in discussing matters of public interest is refreshing, the more so at this time, when the whole world seems to be at the mercy of Bolshevism and all the other "isms" with which we are afflicted.

While we Americans in the Philippines are unable to express our choice at the coming presidential election, many of us are on Harding's side, as we feel that he is level headed enough and sufficiently willing to consider the opinions of those qualified to give them on the vital questions with which the American people are at this time confronted to assure us of the type of administration which our country will be so sorely in need of during the next four years.

Permit me to wish you continued success in the field of journalism and to assure you that the weekly arrival of the Argonaut in this part of the world is hailed with joy by your subscribers.

A FRIEND OF JAPAN.

Colonel Irish Reviews Various Phases of the Japanese Issue.

OAKLAND, October 18, 1920.

EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT: Your reproduction of the article by L. Dumont-Wilden is a proper supplement to articles skimming the same subject by Mr. James G. Blaine and Sidney Coryn. They all focus the sun-glass on one point and purpose, the hunting of Japan around the world by hue and cry. This has made it seem necessary that these writers shall praise the statesmanlike wisdom and genius of Lenine and the "master strokes" by which he appeals to the disorder and insanity of the world.

Look westward, over the curve of the earth, and what appears on that vast horizon from Saigon to the mouth of the Lena River? China, splendid in her physical power, surpassingly rich in her unused natural resources, but divided in spoken language from hakka to cantonese, in chronic internal war, with a government weak, defenseless, and corrupt. Beyond that to the Ural boundary a red welter of murder, theft, and anarchy, invoked and sustained by the "genius" of Lenine. On all that long frontier, from near the equator to the Arctic Ocean, Japan is the only country with a stable government, equipped for offense and defense, that can function. Japan was our friend in peace and our ally in war, yet the American press, especially in California, daily holds up Japan to the hatred, prejudice, and contempt of our people. No slander is too base, no lie too satanic, no malice too rancorous, for the press to use against that country and its people who are legally domiciled here.

Pretextuous writers are sleepless in this malignant task, and your readers have access to their work in your columns.

A bill of particulars is too long for use. M. L. Dumont-Wilden sees something sinister in the presence of Japan in eastern Siberia. Why? Any one who knows Siberia and is not charmed by the genius of Lenine knows that it would be beneficial to civilization and to the world's peace and order if Japan spread her sovereignty over Siberia from the channel of Tartary and seas of Ochotsk and Bering to Lake Baikal. Why should Americans object?

Our press daily sheds salt and crocodile tears because Japan administers the Shantung peninsula, and is sore grieved because there is the grave of Confucius! But no tears were shed when Germany forced China to give the Shantung peninsula to the Kaiser, and we moistened no handkerchiefs when the grave of Confucius was trampled by the hard heels of German soldiers. Japan drove Germany out of China, and by public law and the practice and custom of the ages subrogated to all German rights in the Shantung peninsula.

Japan enfranchised China to enter the war on the side of the Allies, which she would not have dared do with Germany seated in the Gibraltar she had built at Kaiochow.

Our newspapers want our government to demand that Japan say when she will give up Shantung! Suppose Japan should demand that we say when we will give up the Philippines! Her right to demand is as good as ours.

Recently columns have appeared in our local press on the iniquity of letting Japan administer the Caroline and Marshall islands, and demanding that they be given to us! By three ways may sovereignty extend over territory—by discovery, conquest, and purchase. The Portuguese discovered those islands. The Emperor Charles V took them for Spain by conquest. At the end of our Spanish war Germany bought them for $4,000,000, and Japan took them from Germany by conquest. Where does our claim to them appear in that chain of title?

Following the policy of attacking Japan for everything she does, our press has teemed with comment as ignorant as it is vicious on Japanese occupancy of the north half of Saghalien Island. How many writers of these attacks know or care about the history of that island? It was always part of the Japanese archipelago. In 1875 Russia stole it from Japan and peopled it with convicts and exiles. Japan at that time was not equipped to defend herself. Russia had only a thief's title to the island until, by the treaty of Portsmouth, the south half was taken back by Japan and Russia was given title to the north half. Now that "inspired genius" Lenine has torn up and abrogated all treaties made by the Czar, including the treaty of Portsmouth, and Japan has taken possession of the north half of Saghalien, as is her right.

The policy of all this abuse of Japan appears to be that we should keep her from expanding in Manchuria, Mongolia, and Siberia, in order to make her a weak and inferior power, lest she become our enemy.

Is it not a more far-sighted and wiser policy to help make her the strong Asiatic power and keep her as our friend? The report of our Department of Commerce on our trade with all Asia and Oceania shows that for the eight months of this year ending August 31st we sold American goods of the following values:

To Dutch East Indies.....	$ 34,995,550
To China.....	96,311,017
To Australia.....	73,054,230
To British India.....	65,744,078
To the Philippines.....	61,090,161
To Japan.....	328,663,681

So Japan bought of us within $2,531,355 as much as all the rest of Asia and Oceania. Being our best customer, do the directors of American commerce think this constant jackdaw abuse of Japan is wise?

I hope that China will cease to make futile faces at Japan, and instead will follow her example and organize her abundant power to defend her territory and reform the sordid corruption of her government.

JOHN P. IRISH.

At the start of the reconstruction work in the devastated coal region about Lens, France, the French were taught by several disasters that the retreating Germans, before flooding the mines, had concealed along the walls unnumbered "booby traps." Consequently, in order that the divers, charged with preliminary inspections, may "look before they leap," the government recently purchased from England an interesting apparatus for submarine photography. Lowered down the flooded shaft, this apparatus illuminates a ten-foot zone; then, as switches are pressed at the mouth of the shaft, it photographs simultaneously each of the four walls.

During nineteen months 126,000 persons were killed in automobile accidents in the United States. This included 21,000 children. Estimates place the death rate higher than battle rates of the recent war, and show an average of a death every thirty-five minutes.

DR. BUTLER AND THE LEAGUE.

Nicholas Murray Butler in the address delivered by him at New London, Connecticut, on October 16th, usefully reminds us that there are only two real issues of the present campaign. Indeed, he might have said with equal accuracy that there is only one, since the second of his two issues relates in general terms to the perpetual rivalries of the Democrat and Republican parties and their respective capacities in the field of domestic government. The one definite and distinctive feature of the coming election is "the relation which the people of the United States are to bear to other nations, and to those movements of political and economic opinion that are common to civilized peoples throughout the world." This means, of course, the league of nations and the attitude of the government of the United States toward the aftermath of war and toward the great movement for world peace which is yet to be shaped and fashioned by the wisdom of the nations.

It is proper, says President Butler, that the government of the United States should take the lead in the promotion of international coöperation. It is fitted for such a task by its own judiciary system, designed for the limitation of governmental powers and for the settlement of controversies between individuals and the state. It would have done even more than it has done for the cause of international peace but for the constant distrust of Germany, unable to believe that any judge could act with impartiality in a suit to which his own country was a party. None the less the American idea of peace by arbitration had made steady progress. President McKinley through the agency of John Hay had instructed the American delegates to The Hague Conference of 1899 to propose a plan for an international arbitral tribunal, and the plan was adopted. The work was continued by President Roosevelt, who submitted to arbitration the Pious Fund case, which was then disturbing the relations between the United States and Mexico. The great principle of arbitration had thus been firmly established. It would certainly have led to international justice. It might have been applied to the great war but for the cynical contempt of Germany. It was full of the happiest auguries for the future. It had been applied and it had worked. An International High Court of Justice was actually in sight, the Hague Conference having expressed its approval of a plan which was definitely under consideration by the great governments of the world. The war did not prove the project to be a failure, seeing that it was still in the formative stage. Indeed the war was the best of all reasons why, at the conclusion of the struggle, it should at once be brought to definite accomplishment. This would have been the end sought by a real statesmanship, which would have availed itself of the road already opened rather than seeking other and untested paths at a time when fresh perplexities should have been avoided rather than courted. President Butler points this out in terse and unanswerable phrases:

Following the quick establishment of a just peace, the whole world, the vanquished as well as the victors, the neutrals as well as the combatants, should then have sat down to study the problem of so organizing international coöperation and so framing international policies as to make any repetition of the holocaust of 1914 and the following years highly improbable. Nothing would have been more natural than to begin at the point already reached at the two Hague Conferences, to make use of the experience there gained, and to build upon the foundations there laid. Great Britain, France, Italy, as well as the smaller nations among the Allies, are all believed to have been ready to adopt these policies. Why, then, were they not followed? The answer is that the government of the United States, speaking by the President, who designated himself as the chief American plenipotentiary at the peace conference, insisted upon a different course. It was the President who insisted upon turning his back upon the work of his predecessors in office and beginning again in a new direction.

The speaker was rigidly restrained in his utterance. He left his auditors to draw their own inferences from statements of fact so lucid as to preclude uncertainty. President Wilson had two courses open to him. He might have continued and completed the great work for international peace so auspiciously begun by his predecessors. He chose to begin a wholly new plan, conceived without reflection, born suddenly into a maddened world, and projected as part and parcel of the treaty which it encumbered and entangled. This procedure was not, said the speaker, a triumph of statesmanship. On the contrary it was "a blunder of the first magnitude and is chiefly responsible for the unhappy events of the past two years, for the outbreak of a dozen minor wars, for the delay in economic reconstruction, and for the feelings of despair and despondency that have settled down over so much of the world."

The interests of the world demanded that the treaty be formed and signed without delay and that nothing be allowed to intervene. A large number of senators had urged this course and had recommended that the league be reserved for future consideration. But the President closed his eyes and his ears to the dictates of obvious prudence. In terms of contemptuous denial—Dr. Butler calls it cynical contempt—he announced that the treaty and the league should be so entwined as to be inseparable. He reversed the steps that had taken in Paris during his absence, blocked the negotiations for peace, and proceeded to carry out his own plans. Dr. Butler doubts if Europe had any enthusiasm for the league. But Europe wanted to please the United States. Europe believed that the President represented the United States. How could Europe be expected to follow the course of political events in the United States or to understand the significance of the election and of the action of the Senate? Dr. Butler says:

Despite the warning, clear and unmistakable, given by the people at the elections for senators and members of the House of Representatives held in November, 1918, the President and his associates continued to assure the governments and the peoples of Europe that the United States as a whole favored his policies and would support him in his endeavors. Close observers of American political opinion knew that this was not a correct statement, and that if repeated and accepted it was bound to lead to disaster. It did. Great Britain, France, and Italy all assented to various provisions in connection with the peace settlement and with the league which they did not themselves approve, in order, as they thought, to please the people of the United States. They woke from their dream only to find that they were roundly abused for having themselves led the American plenipotentiaries to support a plan for the aggrandizement of the Allied nations. The situation would be comic were it not so tragic. European peoples hear themselves vigorously attacked for having overreached the United States when they thought they were doing precisely what the United States desired.

Dr. Butler presents to us a novel and disquieting view of the dispute now being waged around the league of nations. He tells us that its support proceeds in large measure from those who see in it a stepping-stone to the internationalism that is now being advocated in so fearful a way by Russia. The league of nations as at present constituted implies a super-government and this, in its turn, means the subsidence of nationalism and the sweeping away of national boundaries in favor of an internationalism without boundaries:

Two widely different sets of proposals are brought forward to meet this situation. The first has as its ideal the breaking down of national boundaries, authorities, and distinctions, and the building up of an internationalism without nations, to rest upon the uncertain economic foundations offered by the conflicting purposes and desires of those who participate in industry. This is the goal of the group now in control of the Russian government, and it is the goal of many of those who in various countries are most eagerly supporting the covenant for a league of nations. This is not because that covenant contains any explicit recognition of their aims and their point of view, but because to their thinking it is a step in the direction in which they would like to move, since it lays a foundation for what they hope could speedily be converted into a super-government. Given a council or an assembly, sitting in a foreign capital, clothed with authority to make recommendations essentially political in character to all the nations of the earth, and it will become more difficult with each passing year to prevent that council or assembly from adding to its power, from taking advantage of opportunities to extend its authority, and from finally laying its hand directly upon what we have always held to be the internal policies of nations. Mark the fact that all this is just as true of other nations as of the United States. In explanation of the fact that the strongest resistance to the plan for the league has come from the United States, it may be said that here perhaps that plan has been taken more seriously than elsewhere and subjected to more minute and more critical scrutiny. Surely the British, the French, the Italian, and the Japanese peoples, to mention no others, would be just as sensitive as are the people of the United States in regard to any proposal that would appear to place upon them a moral obligation to use their armies and their navies, their economic power and their financial influence, at the behest of an international council or assembly, even if their own national representative in such council or assembly should have failed to veto the action of his colleagues.

Internationalism without nations is a contradiction in terms and a wild and perverse dream. Nations represent real and natural groupings of human beings, growing out of bonds of race, of language, of faith, of economic interest, and of political and social opportunity. They are not to be wiped away as with a sponge by the soothing phrases of those whose ideals are so misty and whose hold upon facts is so insecure that they are dangerous visionaries and disturbers of the world's comfort and progress.

Dr. Butler sees no reason why there should not be a league of nations which would be of the most effective kind while avoiding all the faults of the present proposal. A statement of the American view would certainly receive sympathetic acquiescence from the European powers and within a short time there would be an association of nations in which the United States could cheerfully join. But there would be no super-government in such an association. There would be no foreign control over armies and navies and no interference with domestic policies. Then we should have a codification of international law and the creation of an International High Court of Justice. The area of justiciable questions would be extended, and even non-justiciable questions might be approached in reasonable and peaceful ways. The Republican party will not take any reactionary steps in this matter of the world's peace. Dr. Butler in conclusion expresses himself as confident that when the reins of government shall pass into Republican hands on March 4th next the ripest wisdom, the widest experience, and the best talent which the country affords will be called upon to assist in shaping those policies which shall hasten a solution of the people's problems and a meeting of the people's needs. No party, no government, can accomplish the impossible, but the Republican party may confidently be trusted to open in 1921 a new era in the history of our country, and to make powerful and permanent contribution to the cause of international peace and concord and to the advancement of the world's satisfaction and happiness without in any way lessening the control of the American people over their own policies and acts, and without in any way bending or breaking the Constitution of the United States, the sheet anchor of our ship of state.

OLD FAVORITES.

Little Breeches.

I don't go much on religion,
I never aint had no show;
But I've got a middlin' tight grip, sir,
On the handful of things I know.
I don't pan out on the prophets,
And free-will, and that sort of thing;
But I b'lieve in God and the angels,
Ever sence one night last spring.

I come into town with some turnips,
And my little Gabe come along—
No four-year-old in the country
Could beat him for pretty and strong.
Pearl and chipper and sassy,
Always ready to swear and fight;
And I'd larnt him to chaw terbacker,
Jest to keep his milk-teeth white.

The snow come down like a blanket,
As I passed by Taggart's store;
I went in for a jug of molasses,
And left the team at the door.
They sneered at something and started—
I heerd one little squall,
And hell-to-split over the prairie
Went team, Little Brecches, and all.

Hell-to-split over the prairie!
I was almost froze with skeer;
But we roused up some torches,
And sarched for 'em far and near.
At last we struck hosses and wagon,
Snowed under a soft white mound,
Upsot, dead beat—but of little Gabe
No hide nor hair was found.

And here all hope soured on me,
Of my fellow-critters' aid—
I jest flopped down on my marrow-bones,
Crotch-deep in the snow, and prayed.

By this the torches was played out,
And me and Isrul Parr
Went off for some wood to a sheep-fold
That he said was somewhar thar.

We found it at last, and a little shed
Whar they shut up the lambs at night,
We looked in, and seen them huddled thar,
So warm and sleepy and white.
And thar sot Little Breeches, and chirped
As peart as ever you see,
"I want a chaw of terbacker,
And that's what's the matter of me."

How did he git thar? Angels.
He could never have walked in that storm,
They jest scooped down and toted him
To whar it was safe and warm.
And I think that saving a little child
And bringing him to his own
Is a derned sight better business
Than loafing around the Throne. —John Hay.

Hymn to the Night.

I heard the trailing garments of the Night
Sweep through her marble halls!
I saw her sable skirts all fringed with light
From the celestial walls!

I felt her presence, by its spell of might,
Stoop o'er me from above;
The calm, majestic presence of the Night,
As of the one I love.

I heard the sounds of sorrow and delight,
The manifold, soft chimes,
That fill the haunted chambers of the Night,
Like some old poet's rhymes.

From the cool cisterns of the midnight air
My spirit drank repose;
The fountain of perpetual peace flows there,
From those deep cisterns flows.

O holy Night! from thee I learn to bear
What man has borne before!
Thou layest thy finger on the lips of Care,
And they complain no more.

Peace! Peace! Orestes-like I breathe this prayer!
Descend with broad-winged flight,
The welcome, the thrice-prayed-for, the most fair,
The best-beloved Night!

—Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.

That the remote ancestors of the American Indians may have lived in Spain in prehistoric days is indicated by some very remarkable discoveries of rock paintings that archaeologists have made at El Bosque, in the hilly country north of Alpera, a Spanish town about half way between Albasete, situated in the plains of La Mancha, and Alicante, on the Mediterranean. Anthropologists also say that these discoveries throw a fresh light upon the life of prehistoric man in southwestern Europe during the Magdalenian period of the great ice age. These Paleolithic tribes, when not compelled by the rigor of the climate to find their dwellings in caverns where they obtained protection against both the intense cold and the attacks of ferocious animals, lived under rock shelters on the sides of valleys.

Before the war the tourist industry was one of the chief trades in Palestine, as the stream of Christian visitors brought tens of thousands of dollars annually to the Holy Land. The Jews who are at present in Palestine believe that the British mandate will result in a large increase of this lucrative business.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

King Albert of the Belgians is touring South America as the guest of the nations. He is now in Brazil.

Eugene Arceau, French giant, is a recent arrival in New York. He stands eight feet six inches tall, weighs 308 pounds and can lift an ordinary-sized man easily. He has not announced as yet what business he will pursue in this country.

It has just been revealed that the recent secret donor of $1,000,000 to the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra is Edward William Bok, one of the millionaire owners of the Ladies' Home Journal and fifty years ago a penniless young emigrant from Holland.

Peter Vidovitch, registered as a charity guest at the New York municipal lodging-house, died on a pauper's cot. Then it was discovered that he owned Liberty bonds, jewelry, money, and mining claims totaling $125,000.

Harriett May Mills is the candidate of the Democratic party for secretary of state in New York. She is the first woman ever to receive the nomination for this office, and a vigorous campaign is being made to bring to her support women voters of the Empire State.

Marie Novokova, Julia Lateuskova, Valsta Stepanova, Marie Doskova, and Marie Redsinkeva arrived recently on the transport Sherman. The University of Prague has sent these scholarship winners to the United States for study. The scholarships were offered to Czecho-Slovakia by Vassar College.

Miss Retta Pam of New York is enthusiastic about airplanes. She frequently goes by seaplane over the Hudson from New York to the beautiful Sleepy Hollow Country Club for a day's golfing. This seaplane trip is popular with others, also, and is a sample of the increasing popularity of this mode of travel.

Hugh Gibson, American minister to Poland, is planning to return to that country, after a leave of absence in the United States. Mr. Gibson was former secretary of the United States legation in Belgium, where he endeavored to save the life of Edith Cavell, martyred British nurse. He is a Western man.

The Countess Ganna Walska, Russian actress, was recently secretly wed in Paris to Alexander Smith Cochran, New York's wealthiest bachelor. She was a great favorite in Petrograd. Her husband, Baron d'Eingorn, a captain in the Russian army, was killed during the war. The countess has played on the American stage. Mr. Cochran is a sportsman with an international reputation. He is said to be worth more than $50,000,000.

Emir Feisal, who within the last few months, after for a time ruling as king, has been chased out of Syria by the French, is the son of King Hussein of Hedjaz, the shereef of Mecca. After he had received a twentieth-century education in Constantinople he became an official of the Turkish government. But this was more through necessity than because of choice. Neither Feisal nor his father had much in common with the Turk or Turkish rule. In 1914 they saw a chance to break with the British régime and they immediately took advantage of it.

Lady Essex, widow of the Earl of Essex, whose death occurred in 1916, is soon to become the Duchess of Connaught, according to New York dispatches. Her engagement to the Duke of Connaught, uncle of King George of England, is the first instance in which an American woman has become betrothed to a member of the British royal family. Lady Essex was formerly Adèle Grant of New York. The Duke of Connaught was christened Arthur William Patrick Gilbert, the third son of Queen Victoria, and as the governor-general of Canada became well known in this country.

It was because when he was a sign painter he was a good sign painter that Seymour M. Stone came to be a painter of royalty and of the great people of Europe and America. His career is a perfect exemplification of the old copy-book axiom of the sure reward that comes from doing well the duty that lies nearest to one's hand. A collection of his paintings was shown a few weeks ago in the famous Corcoran Gallery of Art in Washington, and there still are wagons being hauled about the streets of Chicago that bear the faint marks of his brush. Seymour Stone was born in Chicago, one of five children in a family that knew the pinch of poverty. At the age of ten the boy was forced to shoulder part of the burden of supporting himself and the other children. He alone of the five manifested artistic ability; and, as the nearest approach to the ambition that was nearest his heart, he got a job as a wagon painter at 50 cents a day. In the meantime he spent his evenings at an art school, working far into the night. Finally he went to Europe and now, after fifteen years' absence, Seymour Stone returns to his native land with the reputation of being one of the greatest living portrait painters. Among those who sat for him were the Princess Marie Alexandra Reuss of Bradenburg, a descendant of Catherine the Great; Princess Wittgenstein of Bavaria, sister-in-law of the Queen of the Belgians; the Viscount de Faramond and Viscountess de Faramond and their son; Admiral Richelieu, and many others.

EDWARD BOK, AMERICAN.

A Noted Editor Tells Us What America Has Done for Him and What He Has Done for America.

Mr. Edward Bok explains how it comes that he writes his autobiography in the third person. Edward Bok, editor and publisher, has a personality quite apart from the Edward Bok who writes this book. Their taste, their outlook, their way of looking at things, are wholly at variance. Indeed the real Bok had great difficulty in hiding himself behind the editor of the Ladies Home Journal. Sometimes in the early days he would break through and reveal himself, but gradually he learned to subordinate his real self to the alter ego who presided over the editorial offices. For such reasons it has seemed proper that the autobiography should be in the third person in order that "Bok" may be appropriately handed from the outside, as it were.

Of the first days of Bok's arrival in America from Holland and of his struggles with a new world and a foreign language the book may be allowed to speak for itself. Among his earlier employments was that of stenographer to the Western Union Telegraph Company, which had just passed into the hands of Jay Gould. But the position, for many reasons, was an undesirable one and the author tells us that he decided to resign:

The day before he was to leave the Western Union Telegraph Company the fact of his resignation became known to Mr. Gould. The financier told the boy there was no reason for his leaving, and that he would personally see to it that a substantial increase was made in his salary. Edward explained that the salary, while of importance to him, did not influence him so much as securing a position in a business in which he felt he would be happier.

"And what business is that?" asked the financier.

"The publishing of books," replied the boy.

"You are making a great mistake," answered the little man, fixing his keen gray eyes on the boy. "Books are a luxury. The public spends its largest money on necessities: on what it can't do without. It must telegraph; it need not read. It can read in libraries. A promising boy, such as you are, with his life before him, should choose the right sort of business, not the wrong one."

The author's early career as a journalist brought him into close contact with many of the leading men and women of his day and among them was Henry Ward Beecher. As a letter-writer he was a constant wonder. He never wrote a commonplace letter. There was always himself in it—in whatever mood it found him:

It was not customary for him to see all his mail. As a rule Mrs. Beecher opened it, and attended to most of it. One evening Edward was helping Mrs. Beecher handle an unusually large number of letters. He was reading one when Mr. Beecher happened to come in and read what otherwise he would not have seen:

REVEREND HENRY WARD BEECHER—Dear Sir: I journeyed over from my New York hotel yesterday morning to hear you preach, expecting, of course, to hear an exposition of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Instead, I heard a political harangue, with no reason or cohesion in it. You made an ass of yourself.

Very truly yours,

"That's to the point," commented Mr. Beecher with a smile; and then seating himself at his desk, he turned the sheet over and wrote:

MY DEAR SIR: I am sorry you should have taken so long a journey to hear Christ preached, and then heard what you are polite enough to call a "political harangue." I am sorry, too, that you think I made an ass of myself. In this connection I have but one consolation: that you didn't make an ass of yourself. The Lord did that.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

Mr. Beecher seems to have been something of a disciplinarian, if we may judge from a story related by Mr. Bok. On one occasion he was annoyed by the décolleté dress of a young girl, a member of his family, and one of her friends who was staying with her. As Mr. Beecher and the author were going upstairs there was the sound of a rush, the gas was quickly turned low, and two white figures sped into one of the rooms:

"My dears," called Mr. Beecher.

"Yes, Mr. Beecher," came a voice from behind the door of the room in question.

"Come here one minute," said Mr. Beecher.

"But we can not," said the voice. "We are ready for bed. Wait until—"

"No; come as you are," returned Mr. Beecher.

"Let me go downstairs," Edward interrupted.

"No; you stay right here," said Mr. Beecher.

"Why, Mr. Beecher! How can we be? Isn't Edward with you?"

"You are keeping me waiting for you," was the quiet and firm answer.

There was a moment's hesitation. Then the door opened and the figures of the two girls appeared.

"Now, turn up the gas, please, as it was," said Mr. Beecher.

"But, Mr. Beecher—"

"You heard me?"

Up went the light, and the two beautiful girls of the box stood in their night-dresses.

"Now, why did you run away?" asked Mr. Beecher.

"Why, Mr. Beecher! How can you ask such a question?" pouted one of the girls, looking at her dress and then at Edward.

"Exactly," said Mr. Beecher. "Your modesty leads you to run away from this young man because he might possibly see you under a single light in dresses that cover your entire bodies, while that same modesty did not prevent you all this evening from sitting beside him, under a myriad of lights, in dresses that exposed nearly half of your bodies. That's what I call a distinction with a difference—with the difference to the credit neither of your intelligence nor of your modesty. There is some modesty in the dresses you have on: there was precious little in what you girls wore this evening. Good-night."

Mr. Bok tells us why it is that scarcely five out of every hundred of the young men whom he knew made any business progress. They were not interested. It was a case of a day's work and a day's pay. It was not a question of how much one would do, but how little one could get away with. And of course self-conceit went with it, and of this we have an instance that might be matched almost anywhere at the present day:

Another youthful clerk in the Scribner retail book store, unconscious of the customer's identity, waited one day on the wife of Mark Twain.

Mrs. Clemens asked the young salesman for a copy of Taine's "Ancient Régime."

"Beg pardon," said the clerk, "what book did you say?"

Mrs. Clemens repeated the author and title of the book.

Going to the rear of the store, the clerk soon returned, only to inquire: "May I ask you to repeat the name of the author?"

"Taine, T-a-i-n-e," replied Mrs. Clemens.

Then did the youthfulness of the salesman assert itself. Assuming an air of superior knowledge, and looking at the customer with an air of sympathy, he corrected Mrs. Clemens: "Pardon me, madam, but you have the name a trifle wrong. You mean Twain—not Taine."

Mr. Bok's connection with the Scribner's gave him the opportunity to acquire many of the details of the publishing business which were to stand him in such good stead later on. Also it brought him into contact with celebrities. Mark Twain was a frequent visitor to the retail store, and occasionally he would wander back to the publishing department:

Smoking was not permitted in the Scribner offices, and, of course, Mark Twain was always smoking. He generally smoked a granulated tobacco which he kept in a long check bag made of silk and rubber. When he sauntered back to the Scribner store, he would generally knock the residue from the bowl of the pipe, take out the stem, place it in his vest pocket, like a pencil, and drop the bowl into the bag containing the granulated tobacco. When he wanted to smoke again (which was usually five minutes later) he would fish out the bowl, now automatically filled with tobacco, insert the stem, and strike a light. One afternoon as he wandered into Bok's office, he was just putting his pipe away. The pipe, of the corn-cob variety, was very aged and black. Bok asked him whether it was the only pipe he had.

"Oh, no," Mark answered, "I have several. But they're all like this. I never smoke a new corn-cob pipe. A new pipe irritates the throat. No corn-cob pipe is fit for anything until it has been used at least a fortnight."

"How do you break in a pipe, then?" asked Bok.

"That's the trick," answered Mark Twain. "I get a cheap man—a man who doesn't amount to much, anyhow: who would be as well, or better, dead—and pay him a dollar to break in the pipe for me. I get him to smoke the pipe for a couple of weeks, then put in a new stem, and continue operations as long as the pipe holds together."

Mr. Bok will be listened to with respect when he talks about women's magazines. Men, he thinks, should edit them because of the business qualifications that are essential. The field was wide open when he entered it in 1889. There was no good magazine for women, and, moreover, there was no magazine personality before the public. The editorial "we" was supreme, and therefore there was opportunity for some editor who would project his personality through the printed page:

He saw, too, that the average popular magazine of 1889 failed of large success because it wrote down to the public—a grievous mistake that so many editors have made and still make. No one wants to be told, either directly or indirectly, that he knows less than he does, or even that he knows as little as he does: every one is benefited by the opposite implication, and the public will always follow the leader who comprehends this bit of psychology. There is always a happy medium between shooting over the public's head and shooting too far under it. And it is because of the latter aim that we find the modern popular magazine the worthless thing that, in so many instances, it is today.

It is the rare editor who rightly gauges his public psychology. Perhaps this is why, in the enormous growth of the modern magazine, there have been produced so few successful editors. The average editor is obsessed with the idea of "giving the public what it wants," whereas, in fact, the public, while it knows what it wants when it sees it, can not clearly express its wants, and never wants the thing that it does ask for, although it thinks it does at the time. But woe to the editor and his periodical if he heeds that siren voice!

Mr. Bok was successful in his negotiations with President Harrison for a series of syndicated articles on "This Country of Ours," and on one occasion he tells us he was called to the White House for a conference. During the course of the interview the President offered him a cigar:

A cigar! Bok had been taking his tobacco in smaller doses with paper around them. He had never smoked a cigar. Still, one can not very well refuse a presidential cigar!

"Thank you," Bok said as he took one from the President's case. He looked at the cigar and remembered all he had read of Benjamin Harrison's black cigars. This one was black—inky black—and big.

"Allow me," he heard the President suddenly say, as he handed him a blazing match. There was no escape. The aroma was delicious, but—Two or three whiffs of that cigar, and Bok decided the best thing to do was to let it go out. He did.

"I have allowed you to talk so much," said the President after a while, "that you haven't had a chance to smoke. Allow me," and another match crackled into flame.

"Thank you," the editor said, as once more he lighted the cigar, and the fumes went clear up into the farthest corner of his brain.

"Take a fresh cigar," said the President after a while. "That doesn't seem to burn well. You will get one like that once in a while, although I am careful about my cigars."

"No, thanks, Mr. President," Bok said hurriedly. "It's I, not the cigar."

"Well, prove it to me with another," was the quick rejoinder, as he held out his case, and in another minute a match again crackled. "There is only one thing worse than a bad smoke, and that is an office-seeker," chuckled the President.

When Mr. Bok visited England he went to see many of the celebrities there with a view to securing magazine articles from them. Among them was the Rev. Charles L. Dodgson, better known as Lewis Carroll, author of "Alice in Wonderland." Dodgson was a shy and retiring man, devoted to mathematics and reluctant to be identified with the famous teller of stories for children:

When Bok explained that one of the special reasons for his journey from America this summer was to see him, the Oxford mathematician sufficiently softened to ask the editor to sit down. Bok then broached his mission.

"You are quite in error, Mr. Bok," was the Dodgson comment. "You are not speaking to the person you think you are addressing."

For a moment Bok was taken aback. Then he decided to go right to the point.

"Do I understand, Mr. Dodgson, that you are not 'Lewis Carroll,' that you did not write 'Alice in Wonderland'?"

For an answer the tutor rose, went into another room, and returned with a book which he handed to Bok. "This is my book," he said simply. It was entitled "An Elementary Treatise on Determinants," by C. L. Dodgson. When he looked up, Bok found the author's eyes riveted on him.

"Yes," said Bok. "I know, Mr. Dodgson. If I remember correctly, this is the same book of which you sent a copy to Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, when she wrote to you for a personal copy of your 'Alice.'"

Dodgson made no comment. The face was absolutely without expression save a kindly compassion intended to convey to the editor that he was making a terrible mistake.

"As I said to you in the beginning, Mr. Bok, you are in error. You are not speaking to 'Lewis Carroll.' And then: 'Is this the first time you have visited Oxford?'"

Mr. Bok had much difficulty in securing aid from England on account of the absence of copyright laws. This difficulty came to a head in the case of Sir Arthur Sullivan, who complained that his compositions were not only stolen, but changed:

The next opposition to Bok's plans arose from the soreness generated by the absence of copyright laws between the United States and Great Britain and Europe. The editor, who had been publishing a series of musical compositions, solicited the aid of Sir Arthur Sullivan. But it so happened that Sir Arthur's most famous composition, "The Lost Chord," had been taken without leave by American music publishers, and sold by the hundreds of thousands with the composer left out on pay-day. Sir Arthur held forth on this injustice, and said further that no accurate copy of "The Lost Chord" had, so far as he knew, ever been printed in the United States. Bok saw his chance, and also an opportunity for a little Americanization.

"Very well, Sir Arthur," suggested Bok, "with your consent, I will rectify both the inaccuracy and the injustice. Write out a correct version of 'The Lost Chord'; I will give it to nearly a million readers, and so render obsolete the incorrect copies; and I shall be only too happy to pay you the first honorarium for an American publication of the song. You can add to the copy the statement that this is the first American honorarium you have ever received, and so shame the American publishers for their dishonesty."

Perhaps the most interesting part of the book is the chapter on feminine nature, a topic on which the author has certainly the right to speak with authority. He tells us of his crusade against Paris fashions and of its failure:

Bok called upon the American woman to come out from under the yoke of the French couturiers, show her patriotism, and encourage American design. But it was of no use. He talked with women on every hand, his mail was full of letters commending him for his stand; but as for actual results, there were none. One of his most intelligent woman-friends finally summed up the situation for him:

"You can rail against the Paris domination all you like; you can expose it for the fraud that it is, and we know that it is; but it is all to no purpose, take my word. When it comes to the question of her personal adornment, a woman employs no reason; she knows no logic. She knows that the adornment of her body is all that she has to match the other woman and outdo her, and to attract the male, and nothing that you can say will influence her a particle. I know this all seems incomprehensible to you as a man, but that is the feminine nature. You are trying to fight something that is unfightable."

"Has the American woman no instinct of patriotism, then?" asked Bok.

"Not the least," was the answer, "when it comes to her adornment. What Paris says, she will do, and blindly and unintelligently if you will, but she will do it. She will sacrifice her patriotism; she will even justify a possible disregard of the decencies. Look at the present Parisian styles. They are absolutely indecent. Women know it, but they follow them just the same, and they will. It is all very unpleasant to say this, but it is the truth and you will find it out. Your effort, fine as it is, will bear no fruit."

Still more disconcerting was his campaign against the aigrette. He showed the torture that it involved to the mother heron and he appealed to the women of the country to discountenance a practice involving such slaughter of the most beautiful of birds:

He waited for results. They came. But they were not those for which he had striven. After four months of his campaign, he learned from the inside of the importing houses which dealt in the largest stocks of aigrettes in the United States that the demand for the feather had more than quadrupled! Bok was dumfounded! He made inquiries in certain channels from which he knew he could secure the most reliable information, and after all the importers had been interviewed, the conviction was unescapable that just in proportion as Bok had dwelt upon the desirability of the aigrette as the hallmark of wealth and fashion, upon its expense, and the fact that women regarded it as the last word in feminine adornment, he had by so much made these facts familiar to thousands of women who had never before known of them, and had created the desire to own one of the precious feathers.

Bok could not and would not accept these conclusions. It seemed to him incredible that women would go so far as this in the question of personal adornment. He caused the increased sales to be traced from wholesaler to retailer, and from retailer to customer, and was amazed at the character and standing of the latter. He had a number of those buyers who lived in adjacent cities privately approached and interviewed, and ascertained that, save in two instances, they were all his readers, had seen the gruesome pictures he had presented, and then had deliberately purchased the coveted aigrette.

Mr. Bok is proud of his Americanization, and he says so in unstinted terms. None the less we can hardly evade the conviction that he has done as much for his adopted country as his adopted country has done for him.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending October 16, 1920 (five days) were $161,500,000; for the five days ending October 18, 1919, $165,800,000; a decrease of $4,300,000.

In its comparative statement of condition at the close of business on Friday with that of October 8th made public Saturday the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco reports an increase in gold reserves amounting to $5,301,000. Total gold reserves this week are reported at $164,938,000, of which amount $53,448,000 is held by banks within the Twelfth Federal Reserve District as against $66,768,000 held by the banks a week ago.

Total reserves this week are $165,358,000, as against $160,183,000 last week.

The total of bills on hand is now $223,305,000, as against $231,574,000 last week. Earning assets are $237,100,000, as compared with $245,413,000 on October 8th. The total reported for resources and liabilities is $456,292,000.

The total of gross deposits is reported at $165,827,000, as compared with $161,191,000. As against a total of $254,380,000 in Federal Reserve notes in actual circulation last week, there are $256,213,000 in circulation now.

The effective manner in which shippers are cooperating in the railroad campaign to increase loading and thus safeguard the car supply is illustrated in a report just issued by the Southern Pacific Company showing that for the month of August this year alone, as compared with August, 1919, over 2400 more cars were made available by improved use of equipment on the part of the public.

The Good Railway Service Association, comprising shippers and public-spirited citizens in almost every community in California, is given credit for helping to make the campaign successful.

The markets during the last two weeks continued to be dominated by the downward price tendency of commodities and materials, this especially applying to the industrial list. Generally speaking, the rails were strong and were merely held stationary when industrials were declining. At times it was apparent that an attempt was being made to feel out rail issues, but their resisting power was great. This was especially noticeable during the last two or three days of September and the first few days of October, when there appeared to be considerable profit-taking on rails, with all offerings quickly absorbed, and the general price tendency upward rather than downward. It was apparent that had the rails been relieved of the pressure brought on them by the weakness of the industrial list they would have scored substantial advances.

To some extent oils shared in the weakness of the industrial list, and were subjected to spasmodic raids by the bear element, which insisted that oil prices must go down in company with other commodity prices.

Students of the oil situation do not believe that this reasoning is sound, but that oil will continue to grow more valuable because usage of crude and refined oils is increasing more rapidly than is its production.

Although money rates remained uniformly at 7 per cent. for call loans, money was not plentiful, and some analysts have regarded Federal Reserve reports of the last two weeks as not having shown proper improvement. It must be recalled, however, that a few months ago a possible financial crisis was feared for this time, and that extraordinarily heavy demands upon money for crop moving are now being made. That the Federal Reserve banks have shown some gain in the face of these demands may be regarded as remarkable, and no longer is there any fear of anything like a panic.

Reports throughout the country as to the labor situation showed that for the first time since 1917 labor was becoming more plentiful throughout the West. In the East a number of concerns which had suspended, or practically suspended, have resumed operations at part or full capacity, but despite this, unemployment in the East apparently increased during the last two weeks. Part of this is due to the influx of immigrants at the rate of about 5000 daily, thus adding materially to the available supply of unskilled or semi-skilled labor. Coincidentally with the news of the increase of unemployment comes the gratifying word that production per man employed is beginning steadily to increase.

While monetary requirements will be heavy for some time to come, the market is apparently in line to feel more cheerful in anticipation of several pending important events.

First, election time is rapidly approaching; all indications apparently point to a sweeping Republican victory, and this is inclined to hearten industry in general.

Second, indications are that the government will very soon authorize immense loans to the railways to enable them to fulfill immediate needs for financing maturing note issues, and much new equipment needed to handle the commerce of the nation. During the last four or five years, while industry and population have been showing steady growth, the railways have practically stood still in the matter of transportation facilities, and now they must catch up. Placing of these loans will mean immense sums of money immediately available for the purchase of materials and distribution in wages, and retirement of maturing railway obligations will release funds for use elsewhere. Equipment companies will probably have their hands full for some time.

The consensus of opinion among the most prominent financial analysts of the nation is that the industrial list approximately has sufficiently discounted future conditions for some length of time, and that while it may be erratic temporarily, it is beginning to show genuine investment bargains which profitably may be acquired on any further breaks. On the other hand, these same analysts believe that public utilities should show considerable strengthening, as all declines in prices of commodities, materials, and wages directly increase their earnings; and that rail stocks and bonds have not much more than started their climb upward toward their proper levels.

For years railroad securities have been in the doldrums, and now for the first time since the early construction days are receiving the benefit of government aid and support, rather than being handicapped by onerous restriction. The government's experiment in railroading evidently proved to it that the railways have dependent upon them the growth and prosperity of the entire nation; that in order to be in position best to serve that growth and prosperity, they must be maintained at a high rate of efficiency; that no institution can be or will be maintained unless its maintenance is made reasonably remunerative to those who have combined to pool their money, time, brains, and energy in such enterprise.

Summarizing the general market, it appears that the securities of American railroads apparently present greater opportunities, because of elemental conditions, than any other class of securities before the American public today.

One effect of the floating of foreign bond issues in this country with high rates of interest—like the $100,000,000 8 per cent. French loan which was so quickly oversubscribed—will be to depress Liberty Bond prices even below present levels. This warning has been given out officially at Washington and is mentioned in a dispatch appearing in the New York Commercial, from which we quote:

"The invariable tendency of bond prices, it was explained, is to sink after a loan of such proportions is put upon the market. To obtain funds for purchase of new high-interest-bearing bonds many investors are forced to throw bonds bearing lower interest upon the market.

"Periods of tight money and high interest rates, such as the present, it was asserted, are invariably accompanied by depression of all old issues of bonds. An unprecedented number of foreign securities are, it was pointed out, now being peddled on the American market.

"Regulation of such foreign securities is actually in the hands of private banking firms.

"The United States government, it was pointed out, is entirely out of the money-lending business and is in no way responsible for any foreign issues in America. This makes it all the more necessary for the average investor to exercise great caution."

There is a mass of what might be termed undigested securities represented on the New York Stock Exchange. The number of new companies listed on the exchange within the last year or so probably has never been equaled in several years' time. Besides there has been any number of so-called war industrials that after selling at negligible prices for years prior to the great conflict became subject of riotous advances on account of sudden and marked prosperity. Many of these concerns have paid handsome dividends, and it is only natural that the declining market, like the last receding wave, leaves more and more driftwood on the bank as it sinks lower and lower.

Most of the Street turned very bullish on industrials following the demonstration the day after the Wall Street bomb outrage, and now that last month's averages are being broken there is a good deal more selling taking place for the account of recent buyers. Some very good specialties may probe their lowest depths long before the general average of industrials has reached the bottom, and the market may be watched for bargain opportunities in this respect.

But as declining prices of commodities affect industrials bearishly it affects the public utility issues very bullishly. Railroads and power companies and gas, electricity, and traction corporations have all suffered extremely during the last six years on account of the rising tendency in everything they had to buy. Their situation was so serious that government and state commissions generally have granted generous rate increases. Now that expenses of operation are coming down, these public utility concerns, whose securities should be among the most favored investments in our whole list, are coming into their own again, and we have a rather unique market phenomenon where one side of the list is going down and the other side is going up. There is such a mass of high-class investment offerings, however, that the so-called standard rails may not be expected to do much in the market for some time, but meanwhile the low-priced rails, which may be classed as prospective dividend-payers, are attracting the attention, not only of the speculator, but of banks and investment interests generally. Stocks like Western Pacific, St. Louis and San Francisco, St. Louis and Southwestern, Colorado and Southern, Rock Island, Southern Railway, Pittsburgh and West Virginia, Big Four and Nickel Plate, among others, have very definite bullish possibilities. Indeed, the imaginative bull may easily see prospects of 50 to 100 per cent. profit on the average in this list of stocks if all goes well within the next year or so.—The Trader.

Increased productivity of labor, already evidencing itself, according to Detroit manufacturers, and becoming more pronounced each week, is one of the brightest spots in the industrial situation.

With an epidemic of price-cutting sweeping the country, manufacturers declare they are depending upon two factors to make these decreases good business. They are lower prices of raw materials and increased production on the part of labor.

The first factor is already a reality. But it is to increased production that the manufacturers are looking for decreased manufacturing costs. Many straws show in which direction the wind of labor is blowing.

One large employer of labor in Michigan says: "There is no decrease in wages, but there is a great difference in my field. Formerly I had to steal men from other concerns, and take whatever men I could get. Now I can pick good men who come to us for work. The result is better work and lower costs."

"Labor is coming to realize that there can come a time when its attitude reacts upon itself," said the assistant general manager of one of Detroit's largest industrial concerns. "I believe that since the war industrial employees have not been 60 per cent. efficient.

In addition, they were independent of orders, taking offense and leaving the job upon the slightest occasion. Today the attitude is different. There are signs that the men are actually performing their duties in an efficient manner. They want to hold their jobs. There is coming competition for the jobs; and they are beginning to realize it."

Some manufacturers state that there seems to be a better class of labor available than in the past. One manufacturer says that a decided increase of individual efficiency in his plant resulted from a change from closed to open shop policy. The following statements were made by manufacturers in the stove and drop-forging lines:

"We find that at present conditions are much better in our business, owing chiefly to closer supervision and a better class of workmen, which was brought about by the fact that we have not had such a large labor turnover recently as we had some time ago. We still find it hard to procure skilled labor, but apparently common labor is more plentiful.

"During September of this year, with the same working force as last year, we find a 20 per cent. production betterment."

An automobile accessory manufacturer, speaking for himself and others in his line, said:

"We note a slight increase in the productivity of individual workmen. The reason for this is that in many departments changes have been made from week-work to piece-work. In all departments in the factories where the change has been made the output is entirely satisfactory, but the output on time labor is fully 30 per cent. below normal."

Unemployment is generally considered a sign of hard times, yet the opinion of experts is that in most lines winter business will be good. Detroit, like the rest of the country, is disturbed by the uncertainty of the price reaction, but that this condition will gradually disappear is the general belief.—The Iron Age.

chargeable to gross inefficiency and dereliction of duty on the part of business men and bankers under the improved banking system now in force, it was declared recently by James S. Alexander, president of the National Bank of Commerce in New York. He spoke at the Waldorf before the eleventh annual convention of the American Manufacturers' Export Association. Answering the charge that bankers fail to cooperate with business in times of financial stress, he said that the action of the banks in conserving credit was the best cooperation they could extend under recent financial conditions.

The country's credit structure was never better built than it is today, he said, and in view of the elasticity given business conditions by the Federal Reserve System, the country need never see another panic. Principles governing the domestic situation, particularly the duty of banks to readjust the credit situation when necessary, apply with especial force to the export trade, he said.

He also expressed the belief that American manufacturers should market raw rather than finished products to Europe if a sound basis is to be laid for equalizing the existing adverse trade balances.

"The peak of credit expansion must soon pass," he said, "but this does not mean that there are ahead of us many serious and necessary adjustments. There must be established stable price levels so that business can be conducted on a basis of confident judgment rather than of guess and speculation. There must also be adequate production, primarily in the more substantial lines of goods, so that we shall not continue to live on a narrow hand-to-mouth margin which is responsible for unstable prices. We must conserve credit so that there will be ample funds for long-time investments to provide for the rehabilitation of essential permanent equipment, railroad building and repair, and necessary housing construction.

"With these necessary readjustments before us, I believe the duty of the banks of the country is clear. It is their duty to interpret the needs of business in view of these foregoing considerations. Since the banks touch all phases of industry and business, they are able to obtain a broader view of the total business situation than is the individual business man, whose enthusiasm or anxiety over his own line may obscure his vision to the greater need and even to his own best interests.

"The banks have seen clearly the necessity of conserving our credit resources lest the financial structure of the country should become overexpanded and weakened. They have seen, too, the need of production, price stability, and adequate transportation. They have realized that our business energies must not be diverted from these requirements. Seeing these things clearly, it has been their responsibility to act in accordance with them.

"Therefore, I believe that it is due to a misconception or to failure to give due weight to fundamental facts if business feels that there has been any tendency on the part of the banks to fail to cooperate with it to the fullest extent in the present business era. Seen in its true light, the attitude of the banks has been the only true cooperation possible. Any other attitude on their part would have been non-cooperation, making more difficult the period of readjustment and recovery to normal, stabilized business, which is what we all want.

"The considerations applying to the attitude of banking in cooperating with business apply with especial force in connection with our foreign trade. International business is in a particularly active period of transition and adjustment. During the war period the ratio of our foreign trade to our total domestic trade has undergone violent changes, foreign business occupying for a time an abnormal importance. There was also produced an abnormal balance of foreign indebtedness in our favor.

"Just what ratio between our foreign trade and our domestic trade may come to be established as normal it is impossible to say at present. But it can be said that a closer approximation to equilibrium between our export and import trade must be expected, whether that be brought about through a decrease of our exports, an increase in our imports, or both.

"If a marked recession in our export trade should prove to be one of the corrective factors tending to stabilize international trade, it is my belief that such a recession should be accepted as economically sound and that we should not incur the dangers of seeking to stimulate by artificial methods the volume of our foreign trade. Where there is a real demand for our goods there will be a real market. It is the business of the banks to finance goods for real markets. It is not their business to attempt to maintain expanded foreign trade when it becomes manifest that there is not the continued economic basis for that expansion.

"We must not finance our foreign trade on a basis that will perpetuate overexpansion in our domestic banking credit. The great bulk of Europe's debts to us is in the form of long-time credits or of commercial credits which it seems impossible to realize on at once. This is a serious element of non-liquidity in our credit structure. If it is necessary to readjust our domestic credit situation, our foreign trade also must be subject to that necessity. The liquidity of our commercial credit structure should be a chief concern. Therefore it is one of the preeminent duties of the banks to encourage a return as fast as possible to reciprocal foreign trade in equilibrium financed by liquid credits."

Mr. John R. Edminson, vice-president of the William R. Staats Company, returned Monday from an extended Eastern trip, which included a visit to Boston to attend the annual convention of the Investment Bankers' Association of America. Mr. Robert Hanley of E. H. Rollins & Sons' San Francisco office, Mr. Robert Hunter of the Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company, and R. B. Barr of Cyrus Peirce & Co. also attended the convention.

A strong California syndicate is offering $1,250,000 Los Angeles Shipbuilding and Drydock Company 8 per cent. serial gold bonds, due 1921-1930. The bonds are secured by first closed mortgage, subject only to leasehold provisions, upon all the company's properties, which have been appraised at $4,844,623.

The company owns and operates a modern and thoroughly equipped shipbuilding plant, situated on sixty-nine acres of well-located water-front property at San Pedro, California, held under an advantageous lease from the City of Los Angeles. In addition the company owns the largest drydock on the Pacific Coast between San Francisco and the Panama Canal.

The William R. Staats Company heads the syndicate, which also includes Blyth, Witter & Co., the Los Angeles Trust and Savings Company, and the Security Trust and Savings Bank of Los Angeles.

Construction work has been resumed on the Calaveras dam of the Spring Valley Water Company and by Christmas time will have been carried to such an extent as to double the present capacity of the reservoir.

The Calaveras dam, which is located in the mountains of the Coast Range midway between the Niles Cañon and Mt. Hamilton, now impounds four billion gallons of water. The work now being executed will increase the storage capacity of the reservoir to eight billion gallons. The Calaveras reservoir will thus rank as the second largest reservoir of the San Francisco water supply system, Crystal Springs being first.

When the Calaveras dam is completed the

One After Another.

Mr. Aumonier has given us another of those sincere and unsensational novels with which his name is associated, a novel of heredity and environment. Three generations are simultaneously on his stage. First we have old Purbeck, owner of "The Duchess of Pless," an eminently respectable public house in Camden Town, London. We do not usually associate publicans with a sort of stern Puritanism and a rigid ethical standard, but here we have the combination, and one by no means unknown in the older countries. Old Purbeck had married a southern woman who had taken to drink amid her dreary surroundings and he had thrown her out after she had given him two children, a boy and a girl. The girl, Laura, inherits something of her mother's disposition, but she has temperament without sunshine and passion without love. The son is commonplace without either the unending virtue of the father or the romanticism of his mother. Toward the end of the story we have the third generation, and once more we seem to see the double and blended strain of old Purbeck and his Spanish wife through the environment of a modernized world. We are by no means sure that heredity thus shows itself, and indeed the author himself leaves it to inference throughout a story that unfolds itself placidly and with comprehensive thoroughness.

ONE AFTER ANOTHER. By Stacy Aumonier. New York: The Macmillan Company.

Learned Ladies.

How very learned they were, these women of the seventeenth century. They put us all to shame, and in a sense they contradict our complacent claims to educational advance. But education in those days was something that had to be coveted and demanded. The women of the great houses might remain as ignorant as they pleased or they might become as learned as they pleased. An aptitude for study seems usually to have been encouraged and aided, and all the resources of the world of learning were at the disposal of the aspirant if only she could pay for them. But there was no general tender of education to the world of women at large. Education as a universal beneficence had hardly been thought of. But none the less the woman who sought education was highly esteemed if only on the ground that it conduced to her improvement as wife and mother. Colonel Hutchinson, we are told, fell in love with his future wife when he saw her Latin books, and the Marquis of Halifax wrote to his clever daughter, "You must be very undexterous if when your husband resolves to be an Ass, you do not take care he may be your Ass."

Myra Reynolds in thus devolving into the intellectual attainments of our great grandmothers has done a careful and a conscientious piece of work. If our great-grandmothers had only known how interesting they would be to us they might have left us a fuller record of their doings and their ambitions, but Miss Reynolds has gone far to make good the lack.

THE LEARNED LADY IN ENGLAND, 1650-1760. By Myra Reynolds. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company.

Everyman's Child.

Miss Loeh is president of the Child Welfare Board of New York City and she now writes this book in the hope of interesting the community at large in a work that she rightly considers to be of the first importance. Thanks to her industry, we now know what is being done for the dependent child, and, more important still, what is not being done.

Miss Loeh does not believe in the institution which perhaps is often the nearest approach to hell that we have devised. She sketches for us the hoarding-out system devised in Scotland and approves of it. But the welfare of the child must be safeguarded by laws. The guardians must be fit for their task and there are thousands of families to whom it would be a joy to have children to care for, irrespective of the emoluments. The hoarding out of dependent children is almost unknown in this country, but it is certainly the simplest solution of a problem that should lie close to the heart and conscience of the nation. Miss Loeh has done a commendable work in thus bringing the matter to general attention.

EVERYMAN'S CHILD. By Sophie Irene Loeb. New York: The Century Company.

Irish Folklore.

There are two ways in which the folklore of a people may be presented. The first way is that of the superior person who talks much and loftily of credulity and superstition. The second is from the far more tolerable standpoint of sympathy and understanding. And indeed there is no conceivable reason why we should reject the concurrent testimony of large numbers of people as to what they have seen and heard because those people happen to be illiterate. The sight and hearing of illiterate people is quite as good as the sight and hearing of the literate, and probably better. Their veracity is quite as great, and probably greater.

Lady Gregory and Mr. Yeats write sympathetically of the folklore of Ireland. That is to say they make a proper allowance for credulity and superstition, but they give credence to the substantial residuum. Lady Gregory's plan is to make a verbatim report of the experiences related to her in the language of the narrator and Mr. Yeats adds copious notes by way of interpretation. They regard these narrations, not as the infant lisps of superstition, but as evidence, and indeed there is no reason why they should not be valued quite as highly as the now innumerable outpourings of the psychic researcher. Indeed we find it by no means difficult to believe that the illiterate mind may be more closely in touch with certain departments of nature and able to see more deeply into them than the educated mind whose corresponding faculties have been studiously paralyzed by materialism. We do not deny the scent or sight of a dog because the dog knows nothing of the binomial theorem. If the dog did know anything of the binomial theorem its eyes and ears would probably be useless for the chase.

But these matters need not be discussed here. It is sufficient that Lady Gregory has thought it worth while to give us these two volumes of carefully collected evidence and that Mr. Yeats has thought it worth while to give us his appreciative and believing interpretations.

VISIONS AND BELIEFS IN THE WEST OF IRELAND. Collected and arranged by Lady Gregory, with two essays and notes by W. B. Yeats. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Brief Reviews.

The latest addition to the Larson Books is "Concentration," by Christian D. Larson (Thomas Y. Crowell Company). So many of the New Thought books seem to be no more than an elaboration of ancient truisms set forth in the guise of new discoveries.

A late addition to the Psychic Series now in course of publication by Henry Holt & Co. is "After-Death Communications," by L. M. Bazett, with an introduction by J. A. Arthur Hill. There is a tiresome monotony about these books of psychic evidence. They are all precisely alike and it may be said that they give a new and unsuspected terror to death.

Among books for children special mention should be made of "The Spartan Twins," by Lucy Fitch Perkins, with unusual illustrations by the author. It belongs to the Twin Series of eleven volumes, and those who want something better than the drivel so often furnished for children will find it here. The Houghton Mifflin Company is the publisher and the price is $1.75.

"Indian Old-Man Stories," by Frank B. Linderman, with illustrations by Charles M. Russell (Charles Scribner's Sons), is another series of old War Eagle's tales. Here the old chief's audience learn "Why the Weasel Is White," "Why Our Sight Fails with Age," "Why Children Lose Their Teeth," and hear around the lodge-fire the beautiful story of Quo-too-quat and the adventures of Looks-at-the-Stars, Strikes-and-Kills, and other heroes.

"The Third Book of Stories for the Story-Teller," by Fanny E. Coe, contains an assortment of illustrated stories for children by such authors as Andrew Lang, Howard Pyle, Abbie Farwell Brown, David Starr Jordan, S. R. Crockett, Elihu Burritt, and Dallas Lore Sharp. It need not be said that it is admirable in every way. Nothing could be better for children. The book is published by the Houghton Mifflin Company. Price, $2.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

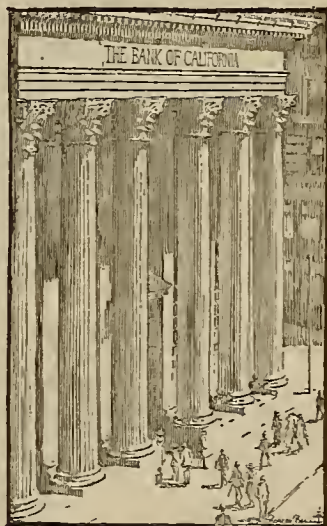

N. C. Wyeth, the artist, is responsible for the admirable illustrations which distinguish the new Scribner edition of Kingsley's "Westward Ho!" The work is edited by Jacqueline M. Overton, librarian and author.

Word comes that Ambassador Brand Whitlock's "Belgium," published by D. Appleton & Co., is being placed in the university and municipal libraries of Belgium as a permanent and authoritative source book for future generations on the subject of the German occupation. The minister of arts and sciences, Mr. Destree, and the Belgian multi-millionaire philanthropist, Mr. Solvay, have been instrumental in this, and they have also added to the collections others of Mr. Whitlock's works, including "Forty Years of It."

When he was last heard from, Isaac F. Marcossow was in the heart of the Belgian Congo, making the long trip from Elizabethville to Boma, the mouth of the Congo River. He is probably the first American journalist to make this trip along Stanley's trail. Mr. Marcossow was the guest of General Smuts at Cape Town, and was also the guest of the Rhodesian government at Bulawayo. He expects to return to America late in the autumn. His latest book, "Adventures in Interviewing," has just been published in England, where it has duplicated the success it achieved in America.

Sir Philip Gibbs, author of "Now It Can Be Told," that story of the conduct of the war which was "not passed by the censor," had an article in a recent number of the New York Times which has started a controversy of considerable proportions among students of contemporary history, and which is in line with the ideas of his new book, "People of Destiny," which the Harpers have just published. The article opens with the sentence "Europe is dying," and goes on to say that without the moral and material support of America, the final crash must come soon.

A report comes from Paris that Monsieur Anatole France, one of the few remaining great literary figures of the last generation, now in his seventy-seventh year, is about to be married to Mlle. Emma La Prevotte.

A Lincoln Play.

Encouraged, possibly, by the success of the Drinkwater play, which so beautifully enshrines the image of Lincoln as a great national hero, Thomas Dixon in "A Man of the People" places the great humanitarian in a light in which he is seen closely and intimately, and made deeply lovable to the hearts of his countrymen.

Since experienced theatre managers have never learned the secret of what makes a play acceptable to the public until it is placed before them, so the mere reader of "A Man of the People" may not pretend to greater wisdom. But it seems as if no man of sensibility could see the piece played without realizing anew, with a swelling heart, what mighty trials tested the spirit of our great national martyr, and how grandly he rose above them.

The play contains three acts and a prologue in which is portrayed a most pathetic picture of the passing of Lincoln's mother, and the anguish of the boy whose spirit receives from the soul of the dying woman the illumination of a great purpose.

The play in subsequent acts portrays the firmness with which Lincoln adhered to his policy when the fortunes of the Union were at their lowest ebb, and in some of the scenes, possibly, there may be too much of a political complexion for the average auditor. There are passages that smack of the oratorical in the lines of the Jefferson Davis rôle, but the author never fails to make an appeal to feelings or hero worship that are pleasurable because they seem to help in righting old wrongs done in those troublous times to the patient, self-sacrificing spirit of the nation's chief.

An effective close is accomplished by identifying Sherman's Atlanta victory with Lincoln's political triumph, and in a very brief epilogue we hear the words of Lincoln's sublime second inaugural speech.

BLASCO IBANEZ' new novel

THE ENEMIES OF WOMEN

Probably the most brilliant picture of Monte Carlo and of the people who frequent its gaming tables yet written. A richly colored, tensely dramatic story of a pleasure-loving Russian Prince, who with a group of friends undertook to turn their backs upon all feminine society. But having sown passion diligently, they reap a whirlwind. It paints brilliantly and without mercy a phase of life that has undoubtedly existed among the idlers of the world's capitals, dazzling, colorful, selfish, and in time meeting its due reward. Only a master of keen and wide observation and a deep sense of truth could create this absorbing story.

MINSTRELSY PLUS GIRLS.

At the Curran they are presenting the Lee and J. J. Shubert show, headed by McIntyre and Heath, called "Hello, Alexander." It is, of course, a girl show, because it is impossible to imagine a musical extravaganza without girls. So they have the usual concomitants: a runway on which bare legs disport their knee-dimpled charms, choruses (not very well sung), dances (extremely well done), and some scenes of old-fashioned minstrelsy brought down to date. One of the handsomest stage effects is the black and white minstrel show, in which the minstrels are splendid to behold in black and white satin, while tiers upon tiers of girls behind them, also sumptuously arrayed in a rich blend of the two contrasting colors, harmonize with a black and white background.

McIntyre and Heath are true to the type familiar to us; Heath playing a burly black autocrat over a hectorated subordinate. They are just as good laugh manufacturers as ever, and what a reproach is their distinct and deliberate enunciation to such gabblers as those who opened the show, and presumably indulged in the delusion that the audience knew what they were talking about.

There are a number of specialists in the company, Brazil and Griffin being very strong in respect to dancing and able coadjutors in the minstrel scenes. Dickinson and Grace Deague also specialized amusingly, the woman being surprisingly plausible as a child of eight. Mabel Elaine is a live wire as a dancer, although too vulgar in her style to please, and the girls—all young and many of them very pretty—changed their elaborate costumes constantly and coquetted from the runway, some of them jumping down into the auditorium and powdering the blushing countenances of the flattered males while they warbled "Pretty Baby"—wasn't it?—although it really doesn't matter.

The piece is as formless as is usual in entertainments of this kind, but it is probably all the more liked by the t. b. m., who surrenders himself to a state of joyful hypnosis when there are songs, jokes, dances, and youthful shapeliness on the stage.

CROOKS AND DETECTIVES.

In "The Dummy" as seen at the Alcazar Harriet Ford and Harvey O'Higgins have, as usual, contrived a comedy that is highly entertaining. It depicts the inner workings of a kidnapping gang, and we even see the kidnapped tot—golden-haired daughter of a millionaire—being carefully guarded by the gang, which is represented as having sense enough to know that the child must be treated kindly. In fact the authors, while giving us an ample supply of melodramatic thrills, have been wise in adhering to a tone of probability throughout. We are shifted by turns from the counsels of the detectives to the counsels of the thieves, and enjoy the effect of reality gained by depicting the latter as being, like Shylock, very much of a muchness with the rest of humanity in the essentials.

Ben Erway must be a happy lad this week, for he is "the dummy"—in other words he plays the principal rôle—and he has made good. "The dummy" is a messenger boy of Bowery experience and vernacular who yearns to be a detective. The yearning is well founded, for the youth turns out to be a born sleuth, in spite of some natural crudities and hesitations. Mr. Erway looks and acts like a boy, and the Bowery vernacular comes trippingly from his tongue. Also, he is very heedful of his expressions and keeps well in the character, and is very promising in the comedy touches.

The next most important rôle—or rôles—is that of the "Spider"—boss of the kidnapping gang—played appropriately by Brady Kline—and his good-natured, good-hearted, easy-going wife, who was suitably represented by Emily Pinter, who made her toughly likable and natural.

Rafael Brunetto played the detective chief, and made a step forward in the second act by successfully portraying a detective's feigned still tipiness covering a sleuth's secret vigilance; and after aggravating us in the previous act by his besetting sin of speaking too rapidly, and rarely making the salient syllables prominent, he showed us that he can speak slowly, for he did.

The leading lady and man had insignificant rôles, representing a mere millionaire and millionaireess. This is Inez Ragan's last week, so I suppose it is good policy to let a disappearing member of the company fade away invisibly to other fields and pastures new, so as not to conflict with the welcome to the new arrival.

"MRS. WARREN'S PROFESSION."

This play is the third one written by George Bernard Shaw, and, like many of the Ibsen plays, it has had a long life of misconception and a struggle to hold its own against popular prejudice.

And yet this is the play of a sternly castigating moralist, an exhorter, who has undertaken to show that Great Britain's capitalistic system of exploiting the working classes had developed a worm-eaten condition at the heart of a magnificent empire. It was partly, also, Shaw's socialism lifting up its voice. But it really seems like a joke on the stodgy police authorities who have repeatedly suppressed this play when one sees it again and realizes what a justifiable crusade it preaches against vice; the inevitable vice that results when youth, with red blood in its veins, is paid starvation wages.

Of course Shaw, with his irrespressible sense of humor and his inability to escape from treating any theme with levity, antagonized public sentiment before the public knew him. Many, no doubt, thought that that famous speech of Mrs. Warren's in which she justifies herself to Vivie was the author's justification of her career. The play then had not been so widely discussed and interpreted and people did not know that Mrs. Warren was a sentimentalist who after a long career as the proprietress of a chain of dubious "hotels" on the Continent proposed to herself the luxury of leading a respectable life in England with a grown-up daughter educated to be a lady to bear her company. But it was not to be. Shaw—reputed corrupter of public morals, in reality the clear-sighted reformer—points out by inference that Mrs. Warren, like Mrs. Tanager, could not escape from her past and that her own daughter, a whip of scorpions in her hand, was the instrument for her punishment. At the same time we can but see what drives girls such as she was and "Aunt Liz" into the only avenue of escape from groveling poverty and a toiling life of dull endurance.

Things are different now and the world is topsy-turvy. The upper classes in England tremble before the growing menace threatening from below. But if the thinking few—among whom Shaw was numbered—had in the far past been heeded, conservative England, which we can but hope and believe will weather the tempest, would not now be rocking perilously in the gale.

"Mrs. Warren's Profession" is a most absorbing play. To be sure it has its faults, the long arm of coincidence being too obviously employed and the author never becoming really serious in his treatment of a tremendous theme—for there are terrible things envisaged in the play—except during the final interview between mother and daughter. However, Shaw has probably had more public attention centred on his play because it is so wittily written than if he had made it a more consistently serious work of art.

Mr. Maitland was absent from the cast of six characters, but the men in his company gave a good account of themselves, Mr. Alford, the leading man, although tripping occasionally in his English, being successful in giving to that sad rascal Frank Gradner—who so well understood Mrs. Warren because she was a kindred spirit—the permanent mood of the universal scoffer. Mr. Richard Lancaster is quite an imposing figure, but his make-up did not indicate the mixture of boulder and blackguard in Sir George Croft's composition, although in other respects the actor was in the part. Mr. Miller is always dependable in utility rôles, and Mr. Horton also played a subordinate part with due effectiveness.

As to Mrs. Warren, while I had no expectations whatever the play is such and the actress is such that Caroline Howard came through. She played with honest directness, she is a player who never slights her words, and her appearance and robust voice and style of speech allowed us the illusion. Similarly Mildred Cates, who is either a poor study or slights her work, was Vivie to us in spite of numerous lapses of memory. That boyish something about her, that directness that Vivie inherited from her mother, was indicated by Miss Cates, who is palpably too immature an actress to have done it all by technique. But I should judge that the girl has ability, and anyway, like Caroline Howard, she came through. So if any one wishes to get a conception of a famous play and the methods of a famous reformer of social conditions he may chuckle over the Shavian wit, be somewhat appalled at what the Shavian candor makes us face, and if he understands it he can not but respect the Shavian aims.

AT THE PLAYERS.

The promised season of repertory is now under way at the Players Theatre, a bill of four one-act plays having been selected for the opening night, with the Gilbert-Sullivan opera, "Ruddigore," and "Richard III" in alternation. Soon there will be "Fedya," "Hamlet," and "Julius Cæsar."

All of the one-act plays are by local authors, and are presented by such effective succession on the bill as to accomplish a fine dramatic climax.

"Thieves," by Helen Mitchell, although played in declamatory style, only claims to be a whimsicality. It represents an Everywoman who isn't much worth fighting for, but Gossip, Discontent, and Sin struggle to get possession of Zoe, and a miracle-play moral evolves. The six characters are played with youthful zest, and one feels tickled on a programme of this kind to see so many of the lesser lights have a chance. For that is what the Players Club is for.

"Charity," by Charles Caldwell Dobie, is a cheerful comedy trifle that provides plentiful occasion for laughter. Nevertheless there is a serious motive, which is that true "charity begins at home"—the same being driven in by showing how a needy church janitor with poverty and sickness on his heartstone is

Three Big Reservoirs

"Spring Valley Water Works consist of two systems of reservoirs—those of catchment, called by courtesy lakes, and those of distribution. The distributing reservoirs are located on the various high grounds within the city limits."—Daily Paper, July 31, 1885.

There are three big reservoirs in the city distributing system—University Mound, College Hill and Lake Honda.

All the water supplied to San Francisco passes through these reservoirs. Their capacities total ninety-six million gallons.

These reservoirs are located at different elevations, and the many service districts of San Francisco are connected with one or another of them according to altitude conditions and pressure requirements.

University Mound supplies the low levels of San Francisco; College Hill the intermediate levels; and Lake Honda the high levels.

Owing to its location at the end of a peninsula, and its hilly character, San Francisco presents exceptional water problems. These have been worked out successfully, owing to the foresight which dictated the location of the three big reservoirs.

"The Spring Valley Water Company now owns all the local desirable reservoir sites."—City Engineer's Report, 1915.

CRADLED at a time when California itself was coming into its birth-right, the Sperry Flour Co. has always been in the van of progress on the Pacific Coast. neglected by the self-righteous group that is absorbed in raising money for foreign missions. Charles Strowbridge plays the janitor with a sympathy that shows imagination working to image the silent, suffering, patient victim of hard times; and the general group were successful in handling the comedy element of the piece and awakening appreciative laughter.

"The Chinese King's Daughter," by Henry Kirk, is an exceedingly interesting number on the programme because, except for one rôle—that of the old queen, very well and intelligently played by Mrs. John Cuddy—the players were all Chinese; Americanized Chinese. For it seems that these young people have their own dramatic organization and at periodic intervals give plays; whether or not occasionally in the Chinese language I do not know.

How strong is this urge to act, of which we outsiders who have it not know nothing. These young people—Jing Fung, Ging Tow, May Oi, and so forth—are yielding to this healthful impulse to throw aside Oriental impassivity and give themselves ardently to the delight of dramatic expression. And their work is most commendable.

For some reason that is rather odd when we think how repressed the Orientals are and how carefully tutored in veiling their inmost souls—from the Occidental, at least—this group seemed more composed and unself-conscious in their task of histrionic expression than would a corresponding group of young Americans.

"The Breaking of the Calm," by Dan Totheroh—at least that is the way it is spelt on the programme—is a very striking and successfully dramatic piece. If it had not yet won its way elsewhere it will. It represents a group on a becalmed vessel who are suffering from short rations. Food is being stolen, and the roused feeling bodes ill for the thief. The author has dated the play in the '50s in order to account for the becalmed state of the vessel and the inability to summon aid. He has accomplished atmosphere, a tense mental condition all around, and the sense of impending tragedy. The players, their imagination profoundly affected, are thoroughly up to doing their task well. Hilda Deniville, with her clear features and dense black hair, and her expressive indication of a luxurious, self-indulgent, unscrupulous siren, fills the conception. Joseph Carson Sturgis as the silent, implacable Chinese whose wife has died of starvation finely suggests avenging destiny without uttering a word. The Lascar boy, as played by Rudolph Hess, screamed in a manner to make chills run down one's spine. And the other three—Messrs. Kroenke, Weule, and McGuire—ahly completed the dramatic group, Mr. Kroenke deporting himself with just that touch of authority and anxious responsibility appropriate to the captain. The piece makes a fine dramatic culmination to the lighter ones, its merit being such as to indicate a career of triumph in the numerous "Little Theatres" of the country.

THE ORPHEUM.

This week's bill begins with a dog show, the cute little animals having been trained to pose in tableaux, if you please. They appear in a series of groups which make a sentimental appeal and caused gurgling ecstasy from dog lovers.

All the rest of the performers were two-legged and some of them bare-legged. For there is a "revue," in which pretty girls disport as bare-legged dancers, while Anatol Friedland's songs are sung by a sweet-voiced tenor.

Rose and Moon do more dancing, and very good dancing it is, though they do not shine as singers.

The Curtis-Fox act, however, seems to be merely a vehicle in which to exhibit the indubitable prettiness of Beatrice Curtis, who is billed as "the most beautiful miss on the American stage," Fox doing a monologue stunt.

Powers and Wallace pleased in a sentimental sketch in which there is a flirtation rapidly developing to a bride-and-groom scene, and Elsie Clark made her narrative songs "get over" in a turn which manifestly pleased the audience.

So did the "Four Harmony Kings," in a genuine ducky quartet, in which they gave the "Old Black Joe" style of songs and a jazz act full of African exuberance.

Tuck and Clare are badly in need of better pater, but nobody could question the quality of their contortioning, which is wonderful, even if it is unpleasant to look at.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

The Savoy Theatre.

"Way Down East," D. W. Griffith's supreme spectacle, is certainly popular at the Savoy Theatre, after a record-breaking engagement at the Curran. Lillian Gish, Richard Barthelmess, Kate Bruce, Burr McIntosh, Lowell Sherman, Mrs. Morgan Belmont, and other notables of the cinema world make up the cast.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

The second and final week of George White's "Scandals of 1919" will give theatre-goers a limited time in which to see one of the most enjoyable of musical revues. There are two acts and sixteen scenes crowded with action and color. Grace Cameron's specialties please immensely and so does the work of the blackface star, Duke Rogers, whose "Oh, Solo Mio," is immensely popular. Jack Edwards' dancing has a style all its own and reminds one at times of George M. Cohan. Helen Wilson is equally nimble-footed. Fred Cady, Irene Gray, Elizabeth Hopkins, Comedian Victor Carne, and the White Way Trio are all seen and heard to fine advantage.

The next Columbia Theatre attraction will be Ralph Dunbar's revival of the ever-popular comic opera, "Robin Hood," opening Monday night, November 1st.

The Curran Theatre.

McIntyre and Heath are filling the Curran Theatre in their latest show, "Hello, Alexander." The Messrs. Shubert have given these famous comedians the best possible show. Heath impersonates the pompous and optimistic Henry Jones, proprietor of the Ever Ready Minstrels, and McIntyre the glib and always hungry Alexander, of lively stable memory. Sunday will be the beginning of the second and last week of these favorite comedians.

The Orpheum.

Of considerable import in the announcement of next week's bookings at the Orpheum is the fact that Roger Imhof, Hugh Conn, and Marcelle Coreene will be included among the headliners. "In a Pest House" will be their offering, the same with which they caused tears of laughter last year.

"In a Pest House" depicts the pests which flock into a small hotel to disturb the comfort of the weary traveler. Among the pests are a nurse who insists on doctoring everybody and a bellboy of somewhat advanced years who never misses an opportunity for a tip.

"Flirtation" will prove a fascinating subject in the comedy which bears that name and which will be presented by a capable company headed by Dorothy Van and Frank Ellis as well as Al Garbelle. "Flirtation" is a comedy incident in the lives of a small group of co-eds.

James Mullen and Anna Francis in "I Get What's Left" will bring back old memories to theatre-goers. One-half of the team will, at least, for it is the same James Mullen who worked with Allan Coogan. His new partner, Anna Francis, is a thoroughly charming young woman.

Muriel Morgan and Minnie Kloter, who will present "A Few Songs and Sayings," are attractive in their own personalities. Theirs is a 100 per cent. act.

Lou Reed and Al Tucker will greet local audiences in "Full o' Pep." They play, dance, and sing at the same time.

James and Etta Mitchell, whose offering is called "Fun in the Air," are responsible for a revolution in gymnastics.

Herman and Shirley, who will present a surprising comedy novelty, "The Mysterious Masquerader," have just returned to America after a two years' trip through England, France, South Africa, and Australia.

Anatol Friedland, noted headliner, will continue his revue of music, song, and dance.

The Alcazar Theatre.

"Too Many Husbands," to have first San Francisco disclosure at the Alcazar next Sunday, was acclaimed "a riot to wise audiences" when A. H. Woods produced it last season at the Booth Theatre, New York. One reviewer was of the opinion that "had all the comedy writers and farce writers in America collaborated they could not have turned out as skillful a piece of stage literature without having something in it that would give offense."

This, too, despite the fact that the first two acts are in the bedroom of Victoria, a capricious, temperamental young matron who married two majors, close pals, believing that the first had been killed at the front. Somerset Maugham, whose "The Moon and Sixpence," has been read by everybody, wrote this comedy, and makes the Enoch Arden theme wildly hilarious. The fascinating Victoria is a comedy rôle that affords splendid opportunity for the introduction of Miss Elwyn Harvey, the new leading woman. Dudley Ayres and Ben Erway are the two husbands, with Brady Kline as a prospective third, Emelie Melville the garrulous mother, Emily Pinter a professional co-respondent, Al Cunningham the solicitor, Dorothy Bartley the manicurist, Latilie Ward Davis the maid, Edna Close the nurse.

"The Argyle Case," to follow Sunday, October 31st, is a big cast melodrama of twin mysteries, murder, and counterfeiting, by Harriet Ford and Harvey O'Higgins, in co-operation with Detective William J. Burns, each development being worked out according

About "Robin Hood."

The present tour of "Robin Hood" is a continuation of the revival begun at the Park Theatre, New York, where capacity audiences greeted the famous De Koven masterpiece. It has already visited more than two hundred cities with remarkable success.

The seat sale opens Thursday, October 28th, at the Columbia. The engagement begins Monday, November 1st.

There will be an exhibition of paintings by Geoffrey Holt at the Taylor Galleries, 318 Stockton Street, from October 24th to November 24th. Mr. Holt has paintings of several of the missions and the deserts of California and Arizona.

"Piedmont Estates" Homesites

— IN —

The East Bay's Finest Residential Park

IN BEAUTIFUL PIEDMONT, commanding a most magnificent view of San Francisco Bay and the Marin County Hills.

THIS SUPERB residential Park is situated on the Sunkist slope of the Fashionable Piedmont District and is absolutely protected from disagreeable winds.

THIS PARK has been subdivided so the contours of the land give each homesite a natural setting. This will appeal to appreciative people, who desire something different from the ordinary flat level land without inspiration or artistic merit.

ONLY FIFTEEN of these remarkable homesites of from one to four acres; each one furnishing a most picturesque location for a home of dignity and refinement.

OVER ONE MILLION DOLLARS of Piedmont's finest homes adjacent to Piedmont Estates.

CAREFULLY RESTRICTED to home costing from $10,000 upward.

THIS UNIQUE LOCATION, the splendid plans prepared for the development of this beautiful residential Park, prepared by landscape Engineers of note, and the perfect building restrictions combine to make this a home place of distinctiveness and individuality.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A dusky chauffeur who recently brought the frame of a big truck from Detroit to Youngstown rode part of the way sitting on the gas tank, but the seat was so hard he soon became tired of it. "Ah don't see how you could stan' it, Henry," a friend observed. "Stan' it," Henry replied. "Mah goodness, dat's jes what Ah couldn't do nothin' else hut."

Ruth was fond of apple butter spread on her bread, the thicker the better. Recently she made her first visit to the country. After several days she said to her hostess, "Didn't you have any apples to feed your cows this year?" The puzzled farmer's wife inquired, "Why do you ask that?" "'Cause," came the reply, "I don't see any apple butter."

Returning home from the dentist's, where he had gone to have a loose tooth drawn, little Raymond reported as follows: "The doctor told me 'fore he hegan that if I cried or screamed it would cost me a dollar, hut if I was a good hoy it would be only 50 cents." "Did you scream?" his mother asked. "How could I?" answered Raymond. "You only gave me 50 cents."

The wife of a wealthy man had occasion to call in the help of a new floor-polisher. "Do you understand your business thoroughly?" "All I ask, madam, is that you inquire for yourself at my last situation. On the floor of the large drawing-room alone five persons broke their limbs during last winter, and one lady slipped down the grand staircase. It was I who polished the floor and the stairs."

Aunt 'Liza waddled into the bank almost out of breath. "Look-a-heah, Mistah Bankah, I wants twenty-five dollahs, an' I'se got to have it right today." "Why, what in the world, Aunt 'Liza, makes you in such a hurry for twenty-five dollahs?" "I'se got to pay some stohage." "Got to pay some storage?"

What do you have to pay storage on?" "Aw' quit foolin' wid me, Mistah Bankah, an, lemme have dat twenty-five dollahs. I'se got to pay de stohage on my husban'. De sheriff's got 'im stohed in jail, an' I got to pay de stohage hefo' I kin git 'im out. Cotton pickin' time is gittin' close by, an' I needs dat niggah in mah business!"

A little fellow sat on a doorstep crying bitterly. Passers-by tried to console him, but without avail. Presently a sympathetic old lady came along. "What's the matter, little hoy?" she asked. "Got my few pants covered with dust," sobbed the hoy. "But they're clean now, dear," continued the lady. "I know they are," wailed the lad. "Then why do you still cry, child?" "'Cos mother wouldn't let me take 'em off when she heat the dust out."

Jones approached the young lady assistant and inquired: "Keep music machine records?" "All kinds." "Got any loud ones?" "Plenty of them." "I want the loudest one you have." "March, waltz, song, or what?" "Anything so long as it is loud." "What's the idea?" "My wife wants it to put on the machine when she has to leave the room so that the folks will have to stop talking until she returns, and she won't miss any of the gossip."

A neighbor, seeing the seven-year-old daughter of a geologist playing with a he-dragged hut cherished kitten, asked what her pet was called. "Well," replied the precocious youngster, "that depends. Father calls her a segregation from an intrusive magma of doubtful genesis; mother refers to her as the basement complex; sister Helen insists that she is a typical example of secondary impoverishment; hut I just call her my dear little kitty."

One of the tellers in a Columbus hank says he has a customer, a teacher, who is the wittiest thing yet. "We make it a practice to give out new hills whenever we are able to send the old ones hack to the government," said the teller, "and once when this customer appeared I apologized that I was unable to give her new bills, and asked her if she had any fear of microbes." "I don't really think there are any on this money," said the teacher; "no microbe would attempt to live on my salary."

"This is rather a curiosity," remarked an artist who was entertaining a lady in his studio. As he spoke he produced a small hut exquisite painting. "It is nice!" gushed his visitor. "I was out in the country one day," he went on, "and had all my materials with me except a canvas. But I was so keen on painting this scene that I took out my handkerchief, laid it upon my case, and painted the picture." "Dear me!" exclaimed the lady. Then a look of horror came over her face as she went on: "But you'll never be able to wash all that paint out of it."

A rural dorky in Georgia, of little experience in traveling, presented himself to the ticket agent at the railway station and inquired the price of transportation to Macon. "Three dollars and forty cents," said the agent. "Oh!" exclaimed the dorky, "dat shore is high! I'd rather walk." And off he started. He had not proceeded very far when the train came along, whistling as it neared the station. "Yo' needn't whistle fo' me," muttered the dorky as he trudged along. "I made yo' an offer oncet an' yo' wouldn't take it. So yo' kin go on, train. I aint a-comin' wif yo'."

Tony Grismick, a Kansas City grocer, was arrested by Lee Nelson, food inspector, after a housewife had complained Grismick sold her some antiquated eggs. The grocer pleaded not guilty in police court. "Is any one here a judge of good and had eggs?" Judge McCombs asked, after hearing the evidence. No one responded. Nelson, who was prosecuting Grismick, toyed with an egg above the judge's desk. "I guess we had better give Tony the benefit of the doubt, and—" began the judge. He was interrupted by a loud "pop." Nelson had dropped the egg. "You're fined $25!" shouted the judge.

THE MERRY MUSE.

Other Times and Manners.

We used to make the eagle scream
With sentiment sublime;
We used to buy five-cent ice-cream
All through the summertime;
We used to work eight hours a day,
And maybe nine or ten;
We used to try to save our pay
And let it work again;
We used to hold in favor slight
The "dude" in soft repose;
We used to think it impolite
To see a lady's hose;
We used to reprehend a word
Whose origin was low,
And say that it should not be heard,
Not even in a show;
Fame's favorites we held apart
From ordinary cares;
We used to talk about "their Art"
And not their home affairs.
No doubt "whatever is, is right."
We must not feel distress
If we're "uplifted" to a height
That causes dizziness.
We'll bravely aviate; and yet
As distant days we view
We can't help feeling some regret
For things we used to do.
—Philander Johnson in Washington Star.

Company.

I'm in a fair way to go mad,
For round about me golfers sbriek,
And I can't understand, I'll add,
The golfing creak.

My eyes get brassie when they broach
That subject. Each one of the clan
Just seems to me, on his approach,
A bogey man.

I can not foursome to be still,
For they are under such a thrall
That, lacking audience, they will Address the hall.

What's that? You say you're weary, too,
Of all this golfiac hot air?
Comrade in pain, I welcome you—
Just putter there!

An Agricultural Problem.

Eavesdroppers are said to hear little that is of benefit to themselves or any one else, hut occasionally one overhears a bit of conversation that tends to prove otherwise. In the lulls of interest during a baseball game recently two young men were discussing work, and especially work in the country.

Much was said that was enlightening about the conditions under which farm labor earns its bread, hut, and occasional ice-cream, hut the man who was most against the farm said: "No, sir! You don't see a companionable girl from one week's end to the other; most of the farm workers are foreigners and not the kind you want to waste your time with; the people in the village look down on us and the girls are all grabbed by the city boys who drive out in their cars every evening; we are regarded as 'hicks' and can sit on the fence and whistle. Even at church we are more or less patronized and it doesn't look good enough to me to coax me out again. What's the use of earning good money if you haven't any girl to spend some of it on?"

This is an angle of the agricultural problem that has not been discussed, hut it sounds as though the man had something in his argument to explain partially the reluctance with which the worker approaches the farm. A pretty girl to dress up for and to take riding in the modern substitute for the old-fashioned huggy is a hoy's privilege whether he is on the farm or works in a city office. If this lack of the girls is to stand in the way of tilling the fields and meadows, some ingenious organization will have to stir itself into coaxing, cajoling, or bribeing the desirable girl into transferring her attentions to the farm.

Mrs. Hays Smith was a luncheon hostess Thursday at the St. Francis.

Mrs. Eleanor Martin gave a dinner last Thursday, when she entertained Mr. and Mrs. William Hearst, Captain and Mrs. Frank Helm, Mrs.

Charles McKenna, Mrs. Charles Chapman, Mr. Philip Paschel, Mr. Jeremiah Coffey, and Mr. Edward Davis.

Mr. Donald Lewis gave a buffet supper Tuesday in his apartments at Stanford Court.

Complimenting Miss Laura Miller, Mrs. Frank Stringham gave a tea Wednesday at her home in Claremont. Among her guests were Mrs. Francis Langton, Mrs. Herbert Hall, Mrs. Jack Okell, Mrs. Alfred Ghirardelli, Mrs. Blair Brooks, Miss Dorothy Grissim, Miss Elizabeth Magee, Miss Dorothy Cawston, Miss Claire Knight, Miss Elizabeth Moore, Miss Elizabeth Bliss, Miss Allison Stone, Miss Lorna Williamson, Miss Juanita Ghirardelli, Miss Florence Veach, and Miss Doris Rodolph.

Mrs. William Rheem gave a luncheon Saturday at the Claremont Club in honor of Miss Virginia Smith. Among the guests were Mrs. Thomas Greer, Mrs. Theodore Rethers, Jr., Mrs. Frank Moller, Miss Elizabeth Bliss, Miss Dorothy Dukes, Miss Dorothy Grissim, Miss Alice Goodfield, Miss Juanita Ghirardelli, Miss Elizabeth Magee, Miss Doris Rodolph, Miss Elizabeth Allen, Miss Hope Somers, Miss Dorothy Cawston, Miss Jessie Knowles, Miss Hatherly Brittain, Miss Katherine Bentley, Miss Laura Miller, Miss Claire Knight, Miss Elva Ghirardelli, Miss Margaret Webster, Miss Elizabeth Moore, and Miss Katherine Maxwell.

Mr. and Mrs. Curtis Hayden are being congratulated on the birth of a daughter.

The Late Major Warner.

Major Murray Warner, who was stricken on the Presidio golf field on the 2d instant, dying shortly thereafter, had an honorable record both in civil and military life. He was an officer of the navy in the Spanish-American war. He was active in the work of protecting the foreign settlement at Shanghai, China, at the time of the Boxer rebellion. He was vice-president of the American Association of China. He held, during the several years of his residence in China, many important professional commissions. Major Warner became associated with the army as a constructive quartermaster in 1917, and his service during the war was active and important. At the time of his death he was stationed at San Francisco on General Liggett's staff, in charge of utilities of the Western Department.

Major Warner was married in 1904, in Shanghai, to Miss Gertrude Bass of Peterboro, Vermont, who survives him.

The Maitland Playhouse.

"The Faith Healer," by William Vaughn Moody, is to be given this coming week at the Maitland Playhouse on Stockton Street. It is a great drama and should be particularly pleasing to patrons of the Maitland.

Though Moody was said to have been at his best in "The Great Divide," there is a touch in "The Faith Healer" that is unexcelled. It is the story of a character to whom, somewhat mysteriously, comes the power of healing. Eventually he settles in a Middle Western farming locality, where he performs his miracles. He falls in love and discovers to his dismay that as his love increases his healing powers are fading. The woman, however, is able to recover for the faith healer that which he has lost.

Moody was recognized by literary critics as one of the foremost American poets and dramatists and his early death came as an irreparable loss. Mrs. Moody is making arrangements for the portrayal of "The Faith Healer" on the screen.

For the remainder of the week George Bernard Shaw's satirical drama, "Mrs. Warren's Profession," played in New York so successfully by Henry Miller, is on the boards.

Loan Exhibit Catalogue.

The catalogue of the Loan Exhibition of paintings by old masters in the Palace of Fine Arts is a book of real value. Besides a list of the pictures on exhibition, it contains commentaries upon the periods represented, with information concerning the individual artists. Mr. Laurvik has given many weeks of labor to the preparation of this book and no expense has been spared in the illustration or the printing, both of the highest order. The catalogue is from the press of Taylor & Taylor. It is so much more than an ordinary catalogue that it is worth permanent hindering and preservation.

Harvest Tea.

To celebrate California's harvest of grains and fruits, Hotel Whitcomb announces a "Harvest Tea" as the next special tea event in the Sun Lounge. In American history harvest festivals have figured prominently as occasions of joy as meaning prosperity for the coming year. At the "Harvest Tea" on Tuesday afternoon, October 25th, in the Sun Lounge of Hotel Whitcomb, Miss Bernadine Holdridge will give a harvest programme of old-fashioned readings and selections in costume. Those who have enjoyed Miss Holdridge's work on this Coast, in the East, and on the Chautauqua Circuit last year will need no further introduction. Another special feature of this occasion will be the Harvest menu with its choice dishes made from California's harvest-time products.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Annexed will be found a résumé of movements to and from this city and Coast and the whereabouts of absent Californians:

Mr. and Mrs. Ralston Page and Mrs. Willard Otis have returned from a trip through the southern part of the state. Mrs. Otis will sail for Panama about November 4th.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Donohoe and their daughters have closed their Menlo Park home and have taken a residence at Broadway and Steiner Street for the winter.

Mrs. Horace Pillsbury and Miss Peggy Pillsbury have returned from Boston, where they have been visiting the former's father, General Charles Taylor.

Mr. and Mrs. Alfred de Ropp have closed their home at Trona and have gone to Englewood, New Jersey, where they will reside in future.

Mrs. John Tallant has taken a house in Palo Alto for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Roger Bocqueraz will leave October 27th for New York. They will sail November 3d for Paris to spend the winter abroad.

Mrs. Paul Wegeforth has arrived from Coronado. She is the house guest of Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Hamilton in Menlo Park.

Commander and Mrs. M. E. Manly have gone to Coronado, where the former has been detailed for the next three years.

Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Haldorn and Mr. and Mrs. Daulton Mann have returned from New York, where they have been for the past six weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Morley have come up from Santa Barbara for the winter and have taken a house on Mason Street.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Chapman returned Tuesday to Los Angeles. They will come north again next month to make their permanent home in San Francisco and on this occasion they will be accompanied by Señora Ygnacio Sepulveda.

Mrs. Hayden Cole returned Friday to St. Paul, after a several weeks' visit in this city with Dr. and Mrs. Walter Boardman.

Mrs. Willard Sperry has arrived from Panama and is visiting Mrs. James Sperry in Sausalito.

Mr. and Mrs. Louis Montague are in Los Angeles, where they are guests of Mr. and Mrs. Hancock Banning.

Sir Frank and Lady Popham-Young, who left San Francisco for the south a few weeks ago, have decided to spend the winter in Los Angeles instead of going abroad.

Mrs. Richard Pierce, Miss Helen Pierce, and Miss Margaret Madison are sojourning in Santa Barbara. They will return to this city next week.

Mr. and Mrs. George Barr McCutcheon are en route to New York, after having passed the summer in California. The last days of their stay in this state were passed in San Francisco.

Mr. and Mrs. Edgar Wilson have returned from Belvedere and have taken a home on Pacific Avenue for the winter.

Mrs. Walter Martin returned last week from New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Girvin have returned from Santa Monica to their home in Menlo Park.

Mrs. Maconday Moore is spending several days in Pebble Beach.

Major and Mrs. Joseph Leiter of Washington are visiting Colonel and Mrs. Colin Campbell in Santa Barbara.

Miss Jennie Blair and Mrs. Alexander McCallum have arrived in New York from France, where they have been spending the summer.

Mrs. J. B. Wright left Sunday for the Atlantic coast.

Mrs. Conger Pratt and Miss Louise Boyd sailed last week for France to remain until after the first of the year.

Mrs. Joseph Grace of Santa Rosa and Miss Geraldine Grace will come to San Francisco in January to remain for the rest of the winter season.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Breeden have returned to New York from their wedding trip. They will reside at the Hotel St. Regis.

Mr. and Mrs. Platt Kent have gone to Los Angeles for a brief sojourn.

Major and Mrs. Victor Morrison will sail in November for the Philippine Islands, where the former has been recently ordered. Before their departure they will visit Mr. and Mrs. Howard Park in San Mateo.

Mr. Andrew Carrigan, Sr., left last week for New York.

Mrs. Van Leer Kirkman returned last week from San Diego and is with Judge and Mrs. Harrison.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Schmiedell will return to town the close of the month from Ross.

Mr. and Mrs. William Heppenheimer, whose marriage took place in New York a fortnight ago, are spending a portion of their wedding trip at Mr. Cyril McNear's country place on the Russian River. Mr. Heppenheimer passed the last summer here with Mr. McNear. His bride was Miss Frances Ruxton of New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Russell Hudnut will leave soon for New York to remain until the spring, when they will sail for France.

Mr. and Mrs. Georges de Latour have come from Rutherford for the winter. They have taken Mrs. J. L. Laine's residence on Broadway.

Mr. Eugene Lent and Miss Frances Lent have gone to New York for a brief sojourn.

Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Symmes of New York left Thursday for the East, after having spent the summer with Mr. and Mrs. Ralston White in Mill Valley.

Mrs. Eugene Freeman has returned from a trip through Southern California.

Mr. Lewis Bradbury of Los Angeles is passing a few days in San Francisco.

Mrs. William Tevis is visiting Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Tevis at Santa Monica.

Mrs. Richard Heimann is in Los Angeles visiting her mother, Mrs. Esther Larned.

The residence of Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Rawlings in Lima, Peru, has been leased for the winter by Commander and Mrs. Paul Fitzsimons.

Registered at Hotel Whitcomb are Mr. W. A. Gillespie, Philadelphia; Judge W. H. Washington, Stockton; Mr. and Mrs. Harry O. Henderson, Anaheim; Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Bowles, Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Jacobson, Los Angeles; Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Dawson, Seattle; Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Healy, Monte Rio; Mr. and Mrs. L. U. Grimes, Merced; Mr. and Mrs. P. H. Armand, Los Angeles; Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Ashbury, Santa Rosa; Mr. and Mrs. G. E. George, Sacramento; Mr. D. J. de Boer, The Hague, Holland; Mr. F. E. Farrow, Yosemite; Dr. and Mrs. R. M. Clark, Santa Barbara; Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Barnett, New York; Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Stanley, Los Angeles.

Players Theatre.

A hit has been registered by the powerful Tolstoy drama, "Fedya," which has been added to the repertory at the Players Theatre. William S. Rainey as the man who finds the true nobility of his character only in his degradation gives a striking portrayal of the Barrymore part. The excellent supporting cast contains, among others, Kathleen Rucker, Talma-Zetta Wilbur, Estelle Loney, Hilda Deniville, Percy McGuire, Harry de Lasaux, Miriam Michels, Louis Steiger, Frederick McNulty, Virginia Sciaroni, Richard Leonard, Leslie Freeman, Boyd Oliver, Jean Unger, Joseph Carson Sturgis, and Frederick Hirschler. The colorful production of "Richard III" receives its next-to-last production this year on Friday night, the 22d, and on Saturday night, the 23d, Gilbert and Sullivan's "Ruddigore" will be sung. The cast includes Miriam Elkus, Reginald Travers, Mahel Gump, Easton Kent, Benjamin Purrington, and Len Barnes. On Monday night the now famous Players' production of "Hamlet" will be revived with William S. Rainey as Hamlet. The repertory for the rest of the week is as follows: Tuesday, four one-act plays; Wednesday, "Fedya"; Thursday, "Ruddigore"; Friday, "Hamlet," and Saturday, "Ruddigore."

Doctor's Daughters' Donation Days.

The Argonaut is asked to remind the public that Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of the coming week are the days designated by the association of "Doctor's Daughters" as donation days, in support of their work. It should be understood that the Doctor's Daughters are not, as the name might imply, daughters of physicians, but that it is the name of a society of charitable women who maintain an establishment for old people in this city and who visit and provide relief for the sick and afflicted. Donations will be received at the White House and at the City of Paris. Miss McEwen, president of the Doctor's Daughters, will be at Nathan & Dohrmann's on the dates named to receive donations personally and to make any explanations that may be desired. Miss Jennie Blair, vice-president, who is usually active in the affairs of the association, is unfortunately not in San Francisco at this time.

Coming Events.

Frank W. Healy announces that he has hooked Charles Hackett, Metropolitan Opera House tenor; Raoul Vidas, Roumanian-French violinist; Louis Graveure, Belgian haritone, and Mme. Frances Alda, Metropolitan Opera House soprano, for concerts in San Francisco, Stanford University, Oakland, and Fresno.

Charles Hackett is an American tenor who came to the Metropolitan Opera House last year direct from the world-famous La Scala Opera House of Milan. In Italy the critics termed Hackett a new "Mario," proclaiming him "a true master of bel canto." No other operatic tenor at present before the public can sing the music of Mozart, Gluck, Franz, or Caccini with the high standard of Hackett.

Raoul Vidas is the name that has attracted the attention of music lovers of two continents. Born in Roumania, Vidas is, however, a product of France. As a type of her training and culture he brings to America a vital message from the sister republic. Under the management of Charles L. Wagner, Vidas made his American debut in New York on November 10, 1918, and fourteen New York newspapers proclaimed his debut a triumph. Boston and Chicago hailed him with equal enthusiasm.

Louis Graveure, the Belgian baritone, is so far ahead of other haritones on the concert stage as to seem a representative of a different art. Mr. Graveure is a master vocalist, the possessor of a voice of exceptionally velvety and lovely quality, which he uses with an art that is as remarkable as it is rare.

Like a tree that grows and blossoms is the career of Frances Alda, soprano. Her art unfolds new beauties as the years pass. No singer that ever appeared upon the concert platform is a harder worker than Frances Alda. Her career in opera is a record of brilliant successes, her popularity with the great Metropolitan audiences grows steadily. Her remarkable popularity in concert makes it necessary for her to make hundreds of appearances each year in concert, and it is a fact that wherever Mme. Alda has appeared her manager never fails to receive requests for return engagements. The very capable Maurice Eisner will be at the piano for Raoul Vidas and Seneca Pierce for Charles Hackett.

Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Sunday symphony series will be given by the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra in the Curran Theatre tomorrow afternoon, yesterday's programme being repeated. The symphony will be Cesar Franck's D Minor. This will be followed by the "Mozartiana" suite of Tschai-kowsky, and Erich Korngold's "Overture to a Drama."

On the following Sunday, October 31st, the second popular concert will be given in the Curran Theatre, when a new work will be presented in the "Vasantasena" suite of Halvorsen. Other numbers to be offered are the "La Dame Blanche" overture of Boieldieu, Tschaiowsky's Italian Caprice, the famous intermezzo and barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffman," and Debussy's charming collection of little piece entitled "The Children's Corner." The programme will close with the ever-popular "William Tell" overture of Rossini.

The Loring Club.

The first concert of the forty-fourth season of the Loring Club is announced for the evening of Tuesday, October 26th, at Scottish Rite Auditorium.

are the stirring settings by Charles Villiers Stanford of three poems of Henry Newhold, entitled respectively "Sailing at Dawn," "The Middle Watch," and "The Song of the Sou-wester" for haritone soloists and chorus of men's voices, with accompaniment of strings and piano, the soloists being W. J. Molitor and R. H. Ward, together with Edward German's "Rolling Down to Rio" for chorus of men's voices with accompaniment of strings and piano, and the negro spiritual, "Deep River," as arranged for chorus of men's voices with similar accompaniment following the transcription of this spiritual by Coleridge Taylor.

Among the other numbers for men's voices included in the programme are three choruses from the cycle entitled "From Every Zone," by Arnold Krug, and also two movements from Mendelssohn's "Festgesang" and Wallace A. Sahin's "The Long Road."

In the accompaniments the club will have the assistance of strings and piano, Hother Wismer being the principal violin and Frederick Maurer at the piano. The concert will be directed by Wallace A. Sahin.

Harding and Shortridge.

Senator Warren G. Harding in a letter addressed to the assistant to the national chairman and Republican state chairman writes as follows with regard to the senatorial election:

"The platform of the Republican party as enunciated at Chicago covers a large range of governmental interests and policies. To the carrying out of these policies and a practical execution of the reforms suggested we are pledged as a party and as individual and official members of it. Committed to this programme we will need, not only Republican executives, but a Republican majority in both branches of Congress. We would be helpless to effect our purposes without both. It is my earnest hope that the electors of California will commission Mr. Shortridge as senator of the United States. I am assured that he is in every way worthy and qualified to fill the office to which he aspires and for which he has been nominated by decisive vote at the free and open primaries of our party. And it is also my hope that California will send in its congressional delegation as many Republicans, united in our faith, as possible."

These are timely words and of a kind to sink deeply into our political consciences. A vote given to Senator Harding for the presidency and withheld from Mr. Shortridge for the senatorship is a vote that goes a long way to stultify itself. The balance of the parties in the Senate will be a close one. Eliminating the few men who call themselves Republicans, but who are actually eccentrics and who will act as such, the margin of Republican safety is likely to be a narrow one. If Mr. Harding should find himself with a hostile Senate, even with an unreliable Senate, the Republican policies will be thwarted at every turn and the Republican administration will be embarrassed almost to the point of impotence. At other and less critical times we may allow expression to personal preferences and to the considerations that arise from intimacy and local affiliations, but no such factors should weigh now. If we are to have a Republican administration—and it is certain that we shall have one—we must have also a Republican Senate, and one whose actions will be definite and certain. The issues are too grave for inconsistencies that at other times may be tolerable. A vote for Harding should under all circumstances imply a vote for Shortridge.

Next Tuesday's Choice.

Senator Harding's strength has increased steadily with the progress of the campaign. He has displayed nearly every good quality that should mark a presidential candidacy, and without any of that mere manoeuvring for advantages that is usually the mark of the meaner and weaker men. There has been no trace of those electioneering "policies," that readiness to set the sails to shifting winds, that indicate insincerity and ignorance. He has allowed no personalities to lower the note that he set for himself. Confronted with the momentous questions of the day, he has invariably displayed, not only a comprehension of their import and their bearings, but a disposition to solve them in the light of strong common sense and of the wide duty that he will owe as President of the United States alike to the nation and to the world. He has had innumerable opportunities to be "clever." He has chosen rather to be wise. But of Mr. Cox it must be said that he has been neither clever nor wise. He has not been even dignified. And he has shown on more than one occasion that he has not even that knowledge of current events, of the obligations of the league of nations for instance, that should follow from the casual reading of a country newspaper. A presidential candidate who is capable of saying that the Fourteen Points are embodied in the league, whereas they are not even remotely hinted at, shows in the first place that he has not read the covenant, and secondly that the elements of statesmanship are wholly lacking in him. But valuable space need not be wasted on the deficiencies of Mr. Cox. Fortunately he has attended to that matter himself.

The country at large, unless we are much mistaken, is now fully awake to the real issue of the campaign. The issue is not the league of nations nor the sad mess of proposals, counter-proposals, and reservations in which we have become involved. These things are important, but there is something far more important. The national vote next Tuesday will determine, not as to the merits of Article X, but as to whether this country is to pass for some further and undetermined period under a rule of Wilsonism, or whether it shall now revert to the constitutionalism upon which it was founded. All other questions are dependent and subordinate. Almost it may be said that they will solve themselves by the direction thus set for them. Wilsonism means a continuation of the governmental purgatory through which we have passed and to which we assented reluctantly and under the stress of war. It means the instant and constant abrogation of the ancient rights of free speech and free act under which we were born, and whenever it shall suit the will and the interest of an autocrat so to abrogate them. It means that to be unprepared alike for peace and for war becomes a national policy. It means taxation up to and beyond the limits of our endurance, not that we may rightly do some worthy thing, but that there may be an extension of those financial profligacies inseparable from government by mean men and vain men and ignorant men. It means that this country is to find systematic representation abroad, not by its wise men, but by its Creels, its Hapgoods, its Herrons, its Bullitts, and its Steffens, men whom a true political sagacity would seek to punish rather than to reward. It means that favor and preferment shall henceforth be won, not by capacity nor virtue, but by flattery and subservience. It means—and it is said regretfully—that at any moment there may be a resumption of those literally awful policies that fanned the red flames of Bolshevism throughout the world, that recklessly incited the ignorant masses of Europe to set the torch to their social systems, that did not hesitate to appeal to nations over the heads of their government, and to encourage by missions and by negotiations the most murderous forms of chaos and anarchy that the world has ever known. The indictment might be a much longer one. It might contain as many counts, and grave counts, as there have been weeks in the life of the Administration. It might echo the words of Mr. Hoover in his recent speech at Indianapolis, when he said: "To have obstinately held up the peace of the world for eighteen months with its fearful cost to ourselves and millions of helpless people; to have rejected the opportunity of amicable adjustment of differences as to methods; to have projected the issue, which, with intelligent coöperation, would never have existed, into the presidential election, is the greatest failure of American statesmanship since the civil war."

And so it may be repeated in all earnestness that this election is to decide the issue between Wilsonism and Constitutionalism, between Caesarism and Democracy. We have awakened to the fact that in the first bewildering days of our war we saw the instant crumbling away of well-nigh everything that we have called Americanism in government. We saw how frail were its foundations, how unstable its structure. We accepted a dictatorship as a temporary expedient and because we were literally incapable of doing otherwise. The war has been over for eighteen months, but the dictatorship has remained, unabashed in its aims, obstinate in its purposes. If we shall allow to it another four years of life it will be rooted so deeply as to be well-nigh indestructible. While all the nations of civilization are extending their base and enlarging their liberties it will be said of America that she alone set back the hands upon the dial and willingly adopted that very autocracy that we fought against and that is being discarded by the nations that we might have led.

The Death of MacSwiney.

The death of Mayor MacSwiney will doubtless appeal to the emotionalism which now plays so large a part in human affairs to the detriment of reason and of orderly government. We shall be told that another star has been added to the constellation of Irish martyrs. There will be a new and more passionate outpouring of protests. Mayor MacSwiney will be enshrined as one who gave his life for the cause, as the latest victim of oppression and tyranny.

The fame of the martyr seems to have fallen upon evil days. For Mayor MacSwiney was not a martyr in any tolerable sense in which that word has ever been used. He was not deprived of his life by any force external to himself. He took his own life. He was sentenced by the law to a short term of imprisonment after a fair and orderly trial, just as thousands of other persons are sentenced all over the world. He was accused of actions that are universally admitted to be crimes, and that would be punished as crimes in America or anywhere else. No one has impugned the manner of his trial. No one has asserted that he was innocent of the charges brought against him. He was notoriously guilty, and he was proud of his guilt, and so were his friends. That he deliberately decided to take his own life by starvation was an act of suicide, and it was none the less an act of suicide because it was the result of fanaticism. The law was responsible for the term of imprisonment, and for nothing else. It did not will MacSwiney's death. It willed him to live. It did everything that was humanly possible to save his life, and it regarded his death as a calamity. To speak of MacSwiney as a martyr is to use a term that has no relation to the facts, however gratifying it may prove to our emotionalism. To maintain that the government ought to have liberated MacSwiney in order to prevent him from taking his own life is a contention intolerable to justice and fatal to law. It means that any prisoner may secure his freedom at any time by the simple expedient of refusing to eat. Should we liberate Mr. Debs, for example, if he refused to eat? Of course we should not. But Mr. Debs is doubtless just as sincere as was Mayor MacSwiney. And it may be said that the offenses committed by Mr. Debs were almost insignificant compared with those of which Mayor MacSwiney was guilty, although he is receiving a very much more severe punishment. MacSwiney was found guilty of having under his control a secret governmental cypher, which is a grave offense in all civilized countries. He was known to be a leader in an organization that presumed to pass sentences of death upon individuals hostile to it, and that carried out those sentences by murder. His punishment was light and lenient. To order his release because he refused to eat would have been suicide of another kind, the suicide of the law and of the government. It would have been a charter to crime, an invitation to anarchy and chaos.

There can be little doubt that the British government has ahead of it a period of storm and stress in relation to Ireland, and the situation will now be aggravated. To a large extent the crisis is due to administrative stupidity in years gone by. A moderate movement that might have been satisfied in a moderate way has now become an extremist movement almost indistinguishable from civil war. The demand for Home Rule has now become a demand for complete separation, and the most violent passions on both sides have been unleashed. When Lloyd George invited the Irish people as a whole to determine on a system of government that would be acceptable to them and pledged himself to grant it he performed one of the few acts of real statesmanship to be found in the history of Irish administration. But it failed. The conference could agree upon nothing, and what was intended as an act of conciliation did no more than give a new impetus to that variety of Bolshevism that called itself the Sinn Fein. The situation has now become deadlocked with a campaign of crime on the one side and of a sometimes ruthless repression on the other. That the British government will grant independence to Ireland is unthinkable. It can no more do such a thing than we could permit the secession of the Southern States. Great Britain can not endure the existence of an independent and a bitterly hostile people almost within sight of her western coast. It would mean her own destruction in the event of another foreign war just as it would have meant a German victory in the war that has now ended. She can not hand over the men of Ulster to the financial mercies of her enemies. The British Empire might just as well dissolve itself on the spot as permit a secession that would be followed by certain ruin and that is advocated exactly for that reason. No sane mind believes that Ireland could maintain herself as an independent state and against the fierce internal discords that have devoured her for centuries.

And it may be said with equal truth that no sane mind wishes for the dissolution of the British Empire nor for any addition to its perplexities at a time when it is the sheet anchor of decent government in Europe, Asia, and Africa. It has its defects. It has committed grave errors. What government has not? But its dissolution would mean anarchy over a large part of the globe. It would mean the unleashing of a hundred racial hates, and with what result upon ourselves there is no need to indicate. If British government has largely failed in Ireland it has certainly not failed elsewhere, as witness the almost incredible spectacle of Boer generals in command of British armies, a Boer general as prime minister of a British colony, and another Boer general high in the conclaves of the empire. Nothing but the most dangerous political irresponsibility, nothing but treason against the peace of the world, would now desire a weakening of the greatest of the old world forces making for stability and good government, and at a time when stability and good government everywhere—here as elsewhere—are threatened by perils unprecedented in the history of the race.

Our Local Issues.

The ballot paper to be presented to the luckless voter next Tuesday will represent the science of government reduced to the burlesque. He will be invited to express opinions on some forty-eight legislative proposals. If the citizen is exceptionally well informed and with exceptional leisure he may be actually competent to vote on some half-dozen of them. No human mind could compass them all, nor anything like all. Most of them are of far-reaching import, and it may be said that the true import is usually out of sight—their promoters have seen to that. They comprise some of the niceties of law, finance, property, education, and taxation. The average voter has hardly even heard of most of them, and he will not hear of them until he glances at them—usually with disgust, we suspect—on the ballot paper. But every illicit interest that expects to be served by these proposals will be on hand in full voting force and it may be said that every illicit interest is busily trading with every other illicit interest on the principle of "you scratch my back and I'll scratch yours." It is only the honest voter who will not know what to do. There will be no uncertainty among the rogues, and their name is legion.

The Argonaut has been asked for its advice as to these forty-eight proposals. It must respectfully decline, except in general terms. Citizens should vote only for those changes that they thoroughly understand, and if this advice be taken the vote will be an extraordinarily low one, as it should be. On all other proposals they should vote "No." Every blank should be filled.

As has already been said, the average citizen will view this ballot paper with disgust. He will wonder how we came to be led into such a folly, such an abortion. It will indeed be fortunate for the state if he learns henceforth to distrust the blandishments of the political charlatan who pretends to have the millennium in his pocket and who is doing no more than follow the highly profitable trade of the demagogue.

The system has, of course, broken down and it must be discarded. The average citizen—small blame to him—is no more qualified to determine the intricacies of finance, taxation, and education than he is to extract his own teeth or remove his own appendix. We have proceeded on the theory that expert skill is needed in every branch of human endeavor—except the art of government, the most difficult of all arts. We call in a physician to treat a headache and we make sure that he is duly qualified and authorized. But any voter whatsoever, no matter how ignorant or how perverse, may give his sapient opinion on intricate points of government involving the happiness and even the lives of thousands without any more preparation than a hand-bill pushed into his letter-box.

American government was established on the representative principle, and we have never yet deviated from it without paying a heavy cost. That system intended that we should elect men recommended by their experience and capacity and whose general political ideals were in accord with our own. It intended that we should then leave to those men the framing of our laws subject to such general guidances and checks as were furnished for that purpose. If we elected bad men the remedy was in our own hands. We could always elect good men. Had we adhered to that wholesome plan we should now be spared the sorry sight of many and many a voter who will hurry to the polls on Tuesday to vote on forty-eight propositions of which they have never before heard and that are utterly beyond their comprehension. It is the reductio ad absurdum of government.

The President and France.

The President's note to the French government demanding information as to its alleged communications with Senator Harding has a medical rather than a political interest. The French government is not at all likely to commit a breach of the proprieties in this respect, and indeed no such breach would be involved in a discreet attempt to ascertain the opinion of a man who is now a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and who is about to become President of the United States. Nothing is more likely and nothing is more reasonable than that the French government should take steps to inform itself on the foreign policies of the immediate future with which it will be so vitaly concerned. It is an open secret that French officials are pursuing somewhat dilatory tactics in their foreign relations until such time as Republican policies shall have opportunity to disclose themselves.

But has the President himself always been "honorably mindful" of the government's "international obligations and punctiliously careful to observe all the proprieties of international intercourse"? It would hardly seem so. Did he not publicly appeal to the Italian people over the heads of their representatives and so commit a breach of the proprieties—one might say of the courtesies—without a parallel in diplomacy? It might further be asked if the President's message to the Italian people was not somewhat responsible for the tide of Bolshevism now sweeping over Italy? Did he not publicly state that a military party had gained ascendancy in France, an assertion that was not only untrue, but that was curiously rude. Neither Italy nor France took any notice of these breaches of decorum, although they would have been justified in doing so, and in the most energetic way. Not only did the President throw a torch into the Italian powder magazine, but he went out of his way in a letter to Senator Hitchcock dated March 8, 1920, to charge Italy with imperialistic designs and to compare those designs with the designs of Germany that had been thwarted just as he intended to thwart the designs of Italy. Anything more carefully calculated to wound it would be hard to imagine. Both France and Italy were too dignified to resent such real insults as these, but the President is so unmindful of the glass house in which he lives that he hastens to throw a stone at France for a reason that exists only in his own imagination.

France, of course, has denied the sending of any authorized representative to Senator Harding. None the less it is so open a secret as not to be a secret at all that she has taken steps to ascertain Senator Harding's opinions. She would be foolish not to do so. It is equally well known that there have been many other unofficial conferences, not only with Senator Harding, but with Senator Lodge and others on the reservations to the league. Why should there now be this sudden storm in a teacup?

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Word for the League.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Some people simply can not wink: their efforts to do so merely result in a synchronous hating of both eyes. One organ is inhibited from acting apart from the other. And there are unfortunate people whose minds can not function apart from their emotions. In politics their judgments simply can not act apart from their partisan and personal attachments and aversions. They may honestly try. But they will inevitably come out at the end of a campaign just where the party managers knew from the outset they would come out and so confidently wrote them down as fixed party assets.

But such persons are not likely to be readers of the Argonaut, and in accepting the hospitality of its columns I feel I may talk in as friendly a way to a political opponent as I should expect to do at his fireside and expect as fair a hearing.

My friend and I should probably find ourselves in initial agreement that neither of the men of whom one must soon sit in the presidential chair is big enough to fit the seat where Washington and Lincoln sat, or come anywhere near filling it. And we should probably also agree that these men do not differ so greatly in their hulk that we may not make our choice on the basis of the issues they represent.

At this stage of the campaign we could hardly differ as to what is the one great issue—not the league of nations only, but the large question of our relation to some concert of nations to preserve the world's (not merely our own) peace. Both candidates have committed themselves to some such concert.

My friend and I would agree that if Mr. Cox is elected he will have to make more liberal concessions than Mr. Wilson would accept to get the Senate to approve the league of nations with whatever reserved rights. He would not fight to the last ditch for Article X or any other. And his election would show such popular demand for the league that the Republicans would hardly care to refuse liberal terms offered by Mr. Cox, who would have every practical incentive to "put over" the league covenant in some form. I think my friend would agree, therefore, that a vote for Mr. Cox would be a vote for the covenant.

But my friend would note that Mr. Taft says a vote for Mr. Harding would be also a vote for the league in some form. Against this opinion of Mr. Taft—always an optimist—must, however, be put the more confident assertion of Senator Johnson that a vote for Harding is a vote to turn our back on the league in toto. He has publicly rebuked Mr. Taft for calling in question the sincerity of Mr. Harding, who in his Des Moines speech said he had "turned his back" on the league, seeking, not its "interpretation," but its "rejection." My friend on the other side of the fireplace and I would have, therefore, to think out, not whether Mr. Taft or Senator Johnson is correct as to what Mr. Harding would like to do, but what he could do. And this is the really practical question. What could Mr. Harding do as leader of the party to whose united support he must look for his success as President and as a presumable candidate for renomination in 1924?

If my friend there desires the adoption of the covenant, with or without Article X and some other questionable parts, he may puff his panetela with unwonted vigor, but he will probably concur with me in believing that if Mr. Harding should submit to the Senate the league covenant in any recognizable form he must face much the same menace of party rupture that froned him last June. And the antagonism of the bitter-enders would certainly be not less a divisive force because of their feeling that Mr. Harding, in turning his face and not his back to the league, had acted in bad faith, having secured their support during the campaign by promising what he would not have lived up to. To run the risk of such personal antagonism, if not of party rupture, would require the courage of a Roosevelt; and my friend would hardly claim that Mr. Harding is at all Rooseveltian. So my Republican friend would probably agree with me that a vote for Mr. Harding is a vote against the league in toto.

But my friend may say, "Grant that Mr. Harding would have to scrap the league, he is pledged to try to get a substitute for it, an 'association' of some kind." That this would be no easy or assured undertaking my candid friend would readily admit. Mr. Harding would find the nations no longer late comrades in arms, disposed to carry into peace the give-and-take spirit that had won for them a wonderful common victory in war, but each engrossed in its particular problems, some of which arraign their interests against those of their late comrades. It is not at all certain that they, or any large number of them, would scrap their first pact for a new one. It is much more likely, my friend may agree, that any such new pact which they would be willing to make would be so cumbered and complicated by reserved rights and special provisions as to make its practical working extremely doubtful. We should want to Americanize it, the British to Anglicize it, the French to Gallicize it, and if the Germans were made charter members they might wish to Prussianize it. I presume my friend would admit the likelihood of all this and recognize its hazards.

Moreover, I think he would admit that if it is not to arouse the dangerous antagonism (as it certainly would occasion the opposition) of the bitter-enders, whose aversion to any kind of political league with other nations seems to be as bitter as ever, any such compact must be so limited in scope and powers as to be hardly less incapable of much good than it would be of any harm. That Mr. Harding would be disposed to favor such narrowed and slightly-empowered pact may be inferred, my friend may concede, from the rather slight interest Mr. Harding has shown in the whole matter. In an assumedly unguarded moment he characterized involving ourselves in any international movement for peace as "nosing around" in what, as the expression must connote, is not essentially our business. It would be ungenerous, if not unjust, to Mr. Harding to hold him too closely to an unguarded expression; yet even his guarded utterances have much the same implication.

My friend may not go so far as Senator Lodge went during the war (before the league had got into politics): "The great nations must be so united" that "a country desiring war" would know "that the force which the united nations place behind peace is irresistible"; but he will, I think, agree that it would hardly be worth while placing behind peace a force that could very safely be resisted even by a powerful nation "desiring war."

Finally, I do not think my broad-minded friend over there would for a moment contend that his intense dislike for one of the framers of the league covenant should properly determine his attitude toward that or any similar compact itself. If my friend were on the shore where a life-boat was being manned and he, a stalwart oarsman, were asked to take the stroke-oar and go out to save a nearly exhausted man struggling with the waves, he would not afterwards think very highly of himself if he held back because he disliked one of its builders. He is much too broad-gauged to do that. And however far from pleased he may be with some of the lines of the boat and with its breadth of beam, he assuredly would not, if it was the only boat at hand and the only one it might be possible to get, seek to scuttle it. Far from that, my level-headed and big-hearted friend would, I am sure, jump in, not deterred by the measure of hazard attending all brave acts, and do the big thing in the big way he would be glad to remember he had done. W. H. McDUGAL.

Obligations Implied in the League.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 23, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: From the beginning the league of nations has never waxed in strength with the American people, but has waned. Its present standing with the voters will be known on November 3d. Whatever that proves to be will be greater than its deserts. Nine out of ten who vote for it on November 2d will have done so from an honest, if carefully cultivated, belief that if the United States join the league universal and lasting peace must immediately follow.

It is a repetition of the phenomena of the election of 1916, and holds even less of truth. Then the slogan "he kept us out of war" returned Woodrow Wilson to the White House because of an honest, if carefully cultivated, belief in the voters' minds that he would continue to do so.

The optimistic and alluring promise of its preamble that "the high contracting parties * * * in order to achieve international peace and security * * * agree to this covenant of the league of nations" at once translates itself into accomplished fact for those who, because they wish to believe and do not understand, accept words for deeds and promise for performance.

Of these, must be the eighteen well-meaning California women who recently telegraphed Senator Harding:

"The league of nations is a fact. It is functioning and accomplishing its purpose, * * * consequently we propose to urge the election of your opponent on that basis and regardless of party lines."

So, too, and about as effectively may a three-weeks-old babe that breathes and digests its food be said to be "functioning and accomplishing its purpose."

There are so many objections to our joining the league, aside from its proven ineffectiveness, that to detail the would be to carry altogether too many coals to Newcastle, however much Newcastle may need them in perilous and unhappy times. The fight for and against, however, has concentrated on Article X, of which President Wilson is the acknowledged author, and which in dangerous part reads:

"The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league."

The principal disputed point is this. If we join do we or do we not under Article X solemnly, absolutely, and irrevocably commit ourselves to take up arms to protect any and all other members of the league whose territory may be invaded?

Here is what President Wilson had to say on this point in his recent appeal to the voters of America to support the league:

"There is nothing in the covenant which in the least interferes with or impairs the right of Congress to declare war according to its own independent judgment as our Constitution provides."

On August 19, 1919, at the White House, President Wilson discussed the covenant at length with the Committee of Foreign Relations of the Senate. In the course of the conference a question was answered as follows:

Senator Knox—Suppose that it is perfectly obvious and accepted that there is an external aggression against some power and suppose it is perfectly obvious and accepted that it can not be repelled except by force of arms, would we be under any legal obligation to participate?

The President—No, sir; but we would be under an absolutely compelling moral obligation.

The President at another point explained, "Now a moral obligation is of course superior to a legal obligation and, if I may say so, of greater binding force."

This being so, if the occasion should arise would not Congress (no matter what its legal rights "as our Constitution provides") then be "under an absolutely compelling moral obligation" to declare war? Would not that moral obligation be even more compelling, since to refuse could but result in forever besmirching the national honor of the United States and damning for all time the reputation of the American people for fair and square dealing?

If you, like the President, concede "an absolutely compelling moral obligation" can you still hold to the belief that the league will be (any more than the President was) able to "keep us out of war"?

The President at this conference, in answer to a question by Senator Harding, insisted that the league would prevent war:

"If it had been known," stated President Wilson, "this war was coming on, her [the United States] moral judgment would have concurred with that of the other governments of the world and if Germany had known there was a possibility of that sort of concurrence she would never have dared to do what she did."

That the President meant by this that the moral judgment of the United States had from the beginning of the war been with the Allies and against Germany he additionally proved by the following colloquy with Senator McCumber:

Senator McCumber—Do you think that if Germany had committed no act of war, of injustice against our citizens, that we would have gotten in this war?

The President—I do think so.

Senator McCumber—You think we would have gotten in anyway?

The President—I do.

The following excerpts from public speeches of President Wilson show the President's interpretation of the "moral judgment" of the United States upon specified dates:

August 19, 1914: "The United States must be neutral in fact as well as in name during these days that are to try men's souls. We must be impartial in thought as well as in action, must put a curb upon our sentiments as well as upon every transaction that might be construed as a preference of one party to the struggle before another."

December 8, 1914: "More than this proposed at this time, permit me to say, would mean merely that we had lost our self-possession; that we had been thrown off our balance by a war with which we have nothing to do, whose causes can not touch us."

July 23, 1915: "The government of the United States and the imperial German government are contending for the same great object; have long stood together in urging the very principles upon which the government of the United States now so solemnly insists. They both are contending for the freedom of the seas."

January 31, 1916: "Your interest, your sympathy, your affection, may be engaged on one side or the other, but it is your duty to stand off and not let this nation be drawn into the war."

May 27, 1916: "With its causes [the war's] and its objects we are not concerned. The obscure fountains from which its stupendous flood has burst forth we are not interested to search for or explore."

December 20, 1916: "I take the liberty of calling attention to the fact that the objects of the statesmen of the belligerents on both sides are virtually the same, as stated to their own people and to the world."

"Words are air, a deed talks louder than a solo played on drums."

JAMES G. BLAINE.

What of the 30,000?

PALO ALTO, October 26, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Four years ago most thoughtful Americans felt and the Administration knew (as has since been proved) that the entrance of the United States into the war was inevitable. Yet in the face of this the Democratic party boasted that their candidate for reelection to the presidency "had kept us out of war," and with that shameful slogan gained the day. The women of California (we are sadly unable to forget) were held responsible for furnishing the narrow margin of votes which turned a seeming defeat into victory; but taking the country as a whole, there can be no doubt that it was chiefly the pacifist sentiment which made the reelection of Woodrow Wilson possible. Nevertheless within six months of the election the inevitable had happened; the conscience of America had triumphed over blindness, cowardice, and hypochondria—America was in the war.

There is more than a suggestion of parallelism between the present presidential campaign and that of 1916. Now, as then, President Wilson's policies are strongly opposed by at least an important part of the American people; now, as then, the Democratic party has made an issue of one of those policies already defeated by the logic of events. In other words, the Democratic candidate is again running practically on a dead issue, as Senator Harding has pointed out.

Will the women of California be deceived again? Will they seek with Cox to turn back water which has already flowed under the bridge—to reopen the controversy which has kept our foreign relations in the air these many months, and which would not be settled, but rather embittered, by the election of another Democratic President? Or will they have the courage with many of the best minds in the country, to follow Harding in his rejection of "the impossible" and his purpose to "unite America in a practical plan?"

Those who are willing to face the facts know that the repudiation of a scheme worked out by a few statesmen around a table at Paris is not going to "break the heart of the world." A real league of nations—something more than the old diplomatic and military alliances of governments—must spring from the demands of the people and rest on their support. This is the sort of league which Harding and those who go with him are seeking. Will not the 30,000 decide, after all, to join them?

Josef Stopak, American violin star, who recently made his American debut at Carnegie Hall, New York, is a young American who has passed his twenty-one years entirely in America, serving with distinction in the army for over a year. His musical training has been received in New York and during the last few years under the artistic guidance of Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist. Stopak considers Thibaud his only real instructor and on his side Thibaud predicts that Josef Stopak will prove quite the most interesting of the young violinists now before the public.

CHRONICLES OF FROISSART.

That mediæval Pliny, Sir John Froissart, who died five hundred years ago, was a man of good health, good spirits, and fine character, whose Chronicle, a vivid and faithful picture of things done in the fourteenth century, has never been challenged. No more graphic account exists of any age; no historian ever brought to his task more patience and fidelity. Sir John traveled wherever men of action were to be found; he made friends of them all and he accurately recorded what they told him. In his eagerness for truth he once made a three-months journey on horseback in order to interview a knight who could give him an unprejudiced and non-partisan account of a battle in Flanders.

The courts of England, France, Denmark, Aragon, and Navarre were always open to him. He was Clerk of the Closet to Queen Philippa, secretary to King John of France, the pet of King David of Scotland, the companion of King Richard II of England and King Peter of Cyprus. He knew Chaucer and Petrarch; among his friends were the Black Prince, the Duchess of Brabant, Robert the Hermit, Gui de Blois, the Duke of Berry, Gaston Phoebus, the Dukes of York and Gloucester, the Douglas clan, the Earls of Fife, Mar and March, and the luckless crusaders under the Count de Nevers. His pages are bright with the banners of all these delightful people and with the splendor of mediæval pomp. The sunlight pours through the stained glass of the cathedral windows and illumines the walls and towers of the ancient castles. Everywhere there is the gleam of armor, the languishing eyes of fair women and the chivalrous exploits of their parfit gentle knights.

The vellum manuscript of Froissart's Chronicles in the library of Lord Mostyn of Mostyn Hall has long been known and admired by antiquarians. It was the gem of that fine collection. Last July Lord Mostyn sold it and great curiosity was expressed by the London press as to the identity of the purchaser and the probable destination of the book, which it was hoped would not leave England. The fact may now be stated that the Froissart was bought by a private collector, Commander W. C. Van Antwerp of San Francisco, and that it now adorns his shelves in this city, together with other vellum manuscripts of the period.

Froissart witnessed many strange sights—he once saw six public fountains running wine at the coronation of an English king—but neither he nor the intensely imaginative age in which he lived ever dreamed that a new world was to be discovered in the western ocean, and that on its farthest shore—the Ultima Thule of the Aryan migration—his manuscript narrative was to find a home more than five hundred years after that generation had passed away.

The volume is of extraordinary beauty. It consists of 363 large leaves of vellum, written in a neat and clear book-hand, richly illustrated with paintings in gold and colors in diapered or damask backgrounds, as lovely as cameos. The ornamentation is done in the best style of an art made famous by André Beauneveu and Jacquemrat de Hesdin, the two foremost French miniaturists of the fourteenth century; indeed, Beauneveu may have done the work himself, for he was a neighbor of Froissart at Valenciennes, and the great chronicler mentions him in this book in terms of glowing eulogy. Within the century following Froissart's day the art of the French miniaturists developed to even greater perfection, culminating in the gloriously beautiful Très Riches Heures painted by the Limbours, and now in the Musée Condé at Chantilly. It is an intensely personal art, for it conveys to us realities of the past as nothing else does. It shows us the fashions and vanities of mediæval romanticism, it admits us into the presence of the people; we are permitted to see their social and religious life, their architecture, and their apparel, hence it possesses an historical value which must ever remain the sure reliance of students.

One of the large miniatures in the Froissart represents Sir John on his knees presenting his book to King Edward III. On the right the King of France stands beside Queen Philippa, who holds the hand of a little boy, her grandson, Richard of Bordeaux, the son of the Black Prince and afterward King Richard II. All the famous battles and sea fights described in the narrative—Crécy, Poitiers, Neville's Cross, the Siege of Calais, etc.—are painted with a depth, brilliance, and richness that has lost none of its charm after five centuries. The capital letters are in burnished gold. The banners of each of the famous knights who participated in the battles are painted on the blank margins, forming a frame of heraldic interest and beauty, and of excellent decorative balance.

It is interesting to remember in appraising the value of this book that another though later manuscript of Froissart's Chronicles is in the Museum of Breslau, and was secured to that town in a separate article when Breslau capitulated to the French in 1806. Perhaps it is not too much to say that this is the only recorded instance in which a book played a part in the surrender of a stronghold. Does the restless spirit of Sir John in Elysium know the fame that is still his?

Where have these treasures of an ancient day reposed through the passing centuries? What hands have turned their pages; what hearts have throbbed under their impulse; what dim receding voices have these exploits of chivalry? The Froissart manuscript that is now in San Francisco has a delightful history, and one that enhances its charm. The British Museum officials have established the fact that it was written and embellished about the year 1390 for Pierre de Fontenoy, a famous knight of the fourteenth century and a counsellor of the king. His arms, a lion argent on a sable ground, with his motto, "Nulle Autre," appear on more than one hundred leaves, with those of his wife, a descendant of Simon, Seigneur de Broyes, who founded the monastery at Pejaz in 1104. From their descendants it passed in the sixteenth century to Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurst, first Earl of Dorset, who wrote "The Tragedy of Gorbudoc," the earliest English drama. Buckhurst presented it to that statesman and patron of art, William Cecil, Lord Burghley, High Treasurer under Queen Elizabeth and the wisest of her ministers. Buckhurst's presentation inscription appears on the fly leaf: "Hunc librum Gulielmo Cecilio equiti auro donavit fidelissimus amicus suus. T. Buckhurst." From Burghley's descendants it passed in 1690 to the Lords of Mostyn at Mostyn Hall, N. Wales, where it remained until its recent removal to San Francisco.

H.

For Amendment 12.

The Argonaut publishes by request some of the salient clauses of a plea for Amendment 12 issued by President David P. Barrows of the University of California. This request was received in response to an editorial in the Argonaut asking for the rejection of that amendment. President Barrows says in part:

The university is not able to obtain adequate funds under the present system of taxation. At each session of the legislature the board of control has felt it necessary to cut down the university budget on account of the inadequacy of state revenues. The legislature has appropriated the amounts fixed by the board of control, but these sums have not been enough for the proper support of the university. This occurred in 1913, 1915, and 1917.

In 1919 the board of control notified the regents that on account of the uncertainty of the amount to be realized from state taxation in the years 1919-1921, the university budget for those years would have to be limited to the amount appropriated by the legislature for the two preceding years. As a result the development of the university was retarded, its activities were curtailed, and its usefulness impaired. But even though university activities were so restricted it was impossible to avoid a deficit of $70,000 during the year 1919-1920. Moreover, there were innumerable resignations from the teaching staff during that year. In the College of Agriculture alone 108 instructors resigned, and ninety of them assigned inadequacy of salary as the reason for resignation.

For the year 1920-21 the increased enrollment in all departments of the university, increased salaries for teachers, and the necessity of enlarging facilities for the southern branch of the university at Los Angeles will result in a deficit of $650,000 for the current year. Since 1910 the number of students attending the university has increased 200 per cent., while the classroom space has increased only 20 per cent. The university must continue to educate the graduates of our high schools, and it must pay salaries to teachers on a basis equal to that established in other institutions of similar rank. Moreover, its income must be on a permanent basis in order that plans for development may be made extending over a period of years. But this is impossible when the university's income depends upon legislative action every two years.

The proposed amendment meets the university's needs, and does so by returning to the system under which the university was supported for twenty-three years, from 1887 to 1910. During this period the revenues of the university were derived mainly from an ad valorem tax, which was superseded in 1910 by the adoption of the present system, which, as we have seen, is inadequate. Amendment No. 12 is patterned upon the ad valorem statutes in force from 1887 to 1910, and in substance is identical with them. Leading universities in fourteen other states are supported by a similar tax.

Amendment No. 12 is presented in the form of constitutional amendment because the present system is a part of the Constitution and can only be superseded by constitutional amendment. The adoption of the proposed amendment will not put the matter of the university's income beyond the control of either the legislature or the people, for the legislature has the power to submit to the people any proposition to alter or repeal the measure, and the same course could be taken at any time by the initiative.

The Swiss Republic, which is seeking a loan for the purpose here, may be the first nation to equip all its public services with electrical power. The local conditions are unusually favorable. Coal costs impossible prices; but "white coal," or water power, is splendidly abundant—2,700,000 horsepower in an area half that of Maine. There is no reason why, in time, hydraulic electricity should not only turn the mill wheels and propel the cars of Switzerland, but heat its houses and cook its food. Nature has arranged for Switzerland that its water power should be, not only where, but when it is wanted. It is more abundant in the tourist season than in winter. In every glacial stream which has a high stage every afternoon from the sun's power and low stage after midnight the maximum of power coincides with the "peak of the load" on mountain railways.

Mrs. Clemmie Ellis White, for many years superintendent of the New York West Side Mission, was recently ordained as a minister by the unanimous vote of fourteen clergymen sitting in interdenominational council. The tests are said to have been rigid, and were based on experience, theological faith, and call to the ministry. The ordination of Mrs. White is held to be proof that churches are opening their study doors to women, and is one of the first instances on record. Mrs. White studied in the school of practical experience.

The world's largest crane is in the Philadelphia Navy Yard. It can lift a load of 350 tons.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Men have different ways of taking exercise. Foch skips rope, Billy Sunday turns handsprings, and Secretary Baker carries a market basket.

For thirteen years Rudolph Myers has been building a railroad near Jetmore, Kansas, without any assistance. Twelve miles of grading have been completed, but no rails have been laid. He has paid for the property mile by mile.

"Dr. Max Goldfarb," a well-known Socialist worker in New York and a familiar figure at Jewish public meetings, now occupies a high military position in Moscow, commandant of Russian military academies. His name is Petrovsky.

Francis S. Bennati, a student of the Catholic University, Washington, D. C., claims to have discovered an embalming fluid equal in every way to the fluid used in Egypt to preserve mummies. Government authorities are more interested in the fluid as a preservative for food than as an embalming medium.

The family of Frank Gibley, vice-consul of the United States to Great Britain, is cosmopolitan in other ways than mere traveling. Each of Mr. and Mrs. Gibley's four children were born in different states. Frank, aged six, was born in Missouri; Deborah, aged four, in Texas; Dorothy, aged two and a half years, in Maryland; and Gordon, aged fifteen months, in Kentucky. The family recently returned from abroad.

She is only twenty-six. She was born to a throne. At seventeen she became a Graustarkian princess with a throne and everything. She is entering a convent and taking the veil. And she is only twenty-six. This is Marie Adelaide, Grand Duchess of Luxembourg until her deposition at the hands of her people, who elected, instead, her sister Charlotte. This queer little duchy contains only 199 square miles and 60,000 people. Yet until this war no European power dared to disregard it; a veritable little kingdom out of a George Barr McCutcheon novel, and ruled by girls!

Lord Byng became a soldier when he was twenty-one; he was born September 11, 1862, at the family estate, Wrotham Park, Barnet, Hertfordshire. He entered the Tenth Royal Hussars. From that day in 1883 until the close of the great war he has been constantly on duty in some corner or other of the far-flung empire he serves, piling up commendations, promotions, honors, medals, and even a modest title as a preface to the greater honor of his barony which came with ultimate victory; for he was knighted in 1916 by King George, not because he was the seventh son of an earl, but because he was a "Goer."

How many women and men enjoy a walk of several miles at the age of 102 years? There are few New Englanders today who have never ridden in a machine, fewer who would not like to ride in one if they could, and but one or two who scorn the automobile and enjoy a walk of several miles when past the age of 102 years. Mrs. Janes Russell of Worcester, Massachusetts, lays claim to all these distinctions. At this advanced age she performs all the household duties in her son's home, takes care of all the mending without the aid of glasses, does the family washing every week, and instead of grumbling at its size, admits often that she would like to "take in" washings again to prove her mettle. She attributes her longevity and exceptional powers of endurance to her parents, her mother having lived to be ninety-eight years old, and her father was 104 years old when he died. She is not a woman suffragist and, although she has engaged in many of the forms of work usually designated as men's work, she declares that women should not vote.

Krassin, the Russian Bolshevik minister of trade and commerce, belonged to a respectable family of uncertain origin that settled in the Siberian province of Tobolsk nearly a century ago. As a youth he went to school in Tyumen, where his father had a house on the banks of the Tura. The Siberian exiles then passed on foot through Tyumen on their way to banishment. The sight filled the boy Krassin with horror, and evoked his first revolutionary inclinations. Krassin was admitted to the Technological Institute at Petrograd, and finished his education as an engineer in Berlin. He is numbered among the world's great masters of the science of electrification. In March, 1919, he became commissary of transportation for the Soviet government. He sought to reorganize the ruined railways first and next rail-making factories. Krassin is described as meek of manner, melancholy of face, and dressed in sober black, shabbier than the average British "bag man."

Alexandre Millerand was born in Paris in 1859 and educated in the schools of that city. He studied law at the University of Paris and was called to the bar in 1881. The next year he had his first important case, in which he successfully defended a group of miners who were accused of violence during a strike. The case not only gave him an assured position at the bar and attracted attention to his gift of oratory, but it put him definitely in the ranks of the Socialists. He had been tending in that direction for some time, and the facts and conditions of which he learned as the miners' advocate strengthened his leaning toward socialism. In 1884 he was elected as a Socialist to the Paris municipal council, and for five years continued as a Socialist representative in that body, devoting himself chiefly to legislation that would ease the situation of women and children. In national politics he was a bitter enemy of Boulanger and was a leader in the organization of l'Union de la Jeunesse Republicaine. In 1889 the Socialists elected him as one of the Paris members of the Chamber of Deputies.

The Village Blacksmith.

Under a spreading chestnut tree
The village smithy stands;
The smith a mighty man is he,
With large and sinewy hands,
And the muscles of his brawny arms
Are strong as iron bands.
His hair is crisp, and black and long;
His face is like the tan;
His brow is wet with honest sweat,
He earns what'er he can,
And looks the whole world in the face,
For he owes not any man.

Week in, week out, from morn till night,
You can hear his bellows blow;
You can hear him swing his heavy sledge,
With measured beat and slow,
Like a sexton ringing the village bell,
When the evening sun is low,
And children coming home from school
Look in at the open door—
They love to see the flaming forge
And hear the bellows roar,
And catch the sparks that fly
Like chaff from a threshing floor.

He goes on Sunday to the church,
And sits amongst his boys;
He hears the parson pray and preach;
He hears his daughter's voice
Singing in the village choir,
And it makes his heart rejoice;
It sounds to him like her mother's voice
Singing in paradise,
He needs must think of her once more,
How in the grave she lies,
And with his hard rough hand he wipes
A tear from out his eyes.

Toiling, rejoicing, sorrowing,
Onward through life he goes;
Each morning sees some task begin,
Each evening sees its close;
Something attempted, something done,
Has earned a night's repose.
Thanks, thanks to thee, my worthy friend,
For the lesson thou hast taught;
Thus, at the flaming forge of life,
Our fortunes must be wrought;
Thus on its sounding anvil shaped
Each burning deed, each thought.

—H. W. Longfellow.

Ring Out, Wild Bells.

Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky,
The flying cloud, the frosty light;
The year is dying in the night;
Ring out, wild bells, and let him die!

Ring out the Old, ring in the New;
Ring, happy bells, across the snow;
The year is going—let him go;
Ring out the False, ring in the True!

Ring out the grief that saps the mind,
For those that here we see no more;
Ring out the feud of rich and poor,
Ring in redress to all mankind!

Ring out the slowly dying cause,
And ancient forms of party strife,
Ring in the nobler modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws!

Ring out the want, the care, the sin,
The faithless coldness of the times;
Ring out, ring out, my mournful rhymes;
But ring the fuller Minstrel in!

Ring out false pride in place and blood,
The civic slander and the spite;
Ring in the love of truth and right,
Ring in the common love of Good!

Ring out old shapes of foul disease,
Ring out the narrow lust of gold;
Ring out the thousand wars of old,
Ring in the thousand years of peace!

Ring in the valiant men and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring out the darkness of the land—
Ring in the Christ that is to be!

—Lord Tennyson.

The Panama Canal has finally begun to pay. During the last fiscal year the waterway earned a surplus over expenses of more than $2,000,000, with a total income of more than $8,000,000, in the handling of more than 2500 commercial vessels, besides numerous naval units which passed from ocean to ocean. It is believed that the canal will soon pay interest on its original cost. Now the surplus is eaten up by an accumulated deficit in operating costs. It will require several years to wipe that out.

A loss of more than 35,000,000 in world population has been traced to the world war by a committee formed to investigate the losses. The actual battle deaths were more than 9,000,000, the others were caused by war epidemics, food blockades and starvation, and the fall in the normal birth rate.

Coal in commercial quantities is found in twenty-eight of the states and territories of the United States.

CROWDING MEMORIES

Mrs. Thomas Bailey Aldrich Recalls Some of the Men and Women She Has Known

One usually feels a certain note of melancholy in books of reminiscences. Perhaps it is inevitable that it should be so. The autobiography comes usually at the end of the long life, when early tints have turned to gray and when so many friends live only in the memory. Mrs. Thomas Bailey Aldrich writes on the title-page of her "Crowding Memories" the somewhat despondent line, "All, all are gone, the old familiar faces," and indeed nearly every one of whom she writes has disappeared. But the book itself is by no means despondent. On the contrary it bubbles over with delicate humor and with an intense appreciation of events. Mrs. Aldrich knew every one of her day who was worth knowing, and she seems to have known them all with an intimate intensity due to her own vivid and responsive mind. As a result we have something that is not quite an autobiography, but that is better than an autobiography, perhaps one might say an autobiography without the egotism.

In 1867 Mr. and Mrs. Aldrich settled down in their new home in Boston and it was in the autumn of that year that Boston had the excitement of welcoming Dickens on his second visit to America:

It was on a blustering evening in November that Mr. Dickens arrived in Boston harbor. A few of his friends steamed down in the Custom-House boat to welcome him. It was pitch dark before the Cuba ran alongside. Mr. Dickens' cheery voice was heard welcoming Mr. Fields before there was time to distinguish him on the steamer. He looked like a bundle of animated wraps, and was in most exuberant spirits; the news of the extraordinary sale of the tickets to his readings having been carried to him by the pilot twenty miles out. Mr. Fields, having heard that a crowd had assembled in East Boston and was waiting the arrival of the steamer, decided to take his guest in the tug to Long Wharf, where carriages were in waiting, and very shortly Mr. Dickens was well ensconced in the Parker House, sitting down to dinner with a half-dozen friends, quite prepared, he said, "to give the first reading in America that night if desirable."

There had been great excitement over the sale of tickets for the readings. There were struggles to secure the best seats and a queue was formed twenty-four hours before the sale began:

What memories unfold themselves to my vision of that night, December 2, 1867; the night of the first appearance of Mr. Dickens in the Tremont Temple! Again I am conscious of the expectant hush as Mr. Dickens appears, book in hand, white boutonniere in buttonhole. With quick, elastic steps he takes his place. The whole audience spring to their feet, while round after round of applause, cheer after cheer, shout after shout of welcome greet him. On the stage is a simple device, designed by Mr. Dickens, looking like a reading desk, with a light so arranged as to illuminate the reader's face; behind it stands a long, dark, purplish screen. With a magician's touch the simple desk transforms itself, supple to the master's will—at one time a kind of pulpit with brass rail, the witness box; next the enclosed seats where the jurymen sit; then a numerous muster of gentlemen in wigs, the harriers' seats; then it became the table for Mr. Justice Stareleigh, "who put his little legs underneath it and his little three-cornered hat upon it; and when Mr. Justice Stareleigh had done this, all you could see of him was two queer little eyes, one broad pink face, and somewhere about half of a big and very comical-looking wig. The officer on the floor of the court called out, 'Silence!' in a commanding tone, and the great case of Bardwell and Pickwick began," holding the listeners still and motionless until the foreman brought in the verdict of "Guilty" and fined the defendant seven hundred and fifty pounds. Then Sam Waller's father touched him on the shoulder and, with a mournful expression, said, "O Sammy, Sammy, y' worn't there a alleybi!" With this the great audience shouted with laughter, and the wild applause began again with gathered volume, until even the walls of Tremont Temple itself seemed to echo and vibrate as a pendulum disturbed from rest and swing to and fro.

Dickens paid a visit to the Aldrich home, and the author tells us that if the Sultan of Zanzibar, the Czar of all Russia, the Grand Mogul of India, and all the crowned heads of Europe combined should have knocked at her door, it would not throw the entire household into such a frenzy and flutter as that simple card, "Mr. Charles Dickens":

I well remember the quick beating of my heart as I descended the stairs to the "boudoir," where I found Mr. Dickens seated in the easiest chair in the bay window. A rather short, slight figure, so he seemed to me then, without the manner that stamps the caste of "Vere de Vere." He was dressed—I think dressed in the right word—in a very light, so light that I don't know how to describe it—I can almost say soiled white color—top coat. It was wide and short, and stood out like a skirt, the collar of a much darker shade of velvet. His waistcoat was velvet of another shade of brown, with brilliant red indentations; his watch chain was buttoned into the centre button of his waistcoat, and then it divided itself. I found myself saying, "How do you do," and wondering, if the watch was in one pocket, what was at the other end of the chain in the other pocket, and was tempted to ask him the time, in the hope that he might make a mistake and bring out the other thing. I don't remember what he wore on his feet, and I don't know the plaid of his trousers, but I rather think it was a black-and-white check—what the Englishman calls "pepper and salt." I don't remember any one topic of conversation on that first visit, but I remember well the laughter and good cheer; the charming way in which the guest made these two young people feel that to him they really were persons of consequence and were so regarded by this prince of strangers who tarried within their gates.

Another distinguished visitor at the Aldrich home was Longfellow, who asked permission to see the house, as "Mr. Dickens told me of its charm":

When the short tour of the house was over, lingering a moment in the dining-room door Mr. Longfellow said: "Ah, Mr. Aldrich, it will not always be the same round table for two. By and by it will extend itself, and about it will cluster little faces, royal guests, drumming on the table with their spoons. And then, as the years go by, one by one they will take flight to build nests of their own. The round table will again recede until it is set for two and you and Mrs. Aldrich will be alone. This is the story of the life, the pathetic poem of the fireside. Make an idyl of it; I give the idea to you." Mr. Aldrich did not use the motif, and Mr. Longfellow himself later wrote the poem "The Hanging of the Crane," for which poem Mr. Bonner paid him three thousand dollars for the right to publish it in his paper. Thus the little visit, which Mr. Longfellow in his kindness made, brought for him a dual reward—money and fame, and a larger asset, the pleasure and matronly pride it gave its young recipient.

Soon after the meeting with Dickens and Longfellow Mr. and Mrs. Aldrich made the acquaintance of Mark Twain. Mr. Aldrich had made some casual reference to a poem credited to Mark Twain as being an imitation of another poem by Bret Harte. Mark Twain repudiated the poem and Mr. Aldrich made amends with the following result:

"DEAR MR. ALDRICH: I hear a good deal about doing things on the 'spur of the moment'—I invariably regret things I do on the spur of the moment. That disclaimer of mine was a case in point. I am ashamed every time I think of my bursting out before an unconcerned public with that hom-bastic pow-wow about burning publishers' letters and all that sort of imbecility, and about my not being an imitator, etc. Who would find out that I am a natural fool if I kept always cool and never let nature come to the surface? Nobody."

The last letter in the series was from Mr. Aldrich, ending in this wise: "When you come to Boston, if you do not make your presence manifest to me, I'll put an item in 'Every Saturday' to the effect that although you are generally known as 'Mark Twain,' your favorite nom de plume is 'Barry Gray.' I flatter myself that will bring you."

Mr. Aldrich brought Mark Twain home with him to dinner on one occasion, but inexplicably neglected to inform Mrs. Aldrich as to the identity of the visitor, who aroused her resentment by his eccentric manner:

When the hands of the clock pointed to the usual dinner hour, no maid appeared with the announcement that dinner was served, nor was there any answering notice or fellow sympathy to the eye that looked to the mistress of the feast, and then back to the clock, whose hands slowly moved to quarter past—half past—quarter of—and then the strange guest arose and said he thought he would go. The adieus were made and accepted, by one with icy formality, which the other member of the fraternity tried to make atonement for by an exuberant cordiality as he escorted his guest to the door. On his return to the library with unwonted sternness he asked why the dinner was three-quarters of an hour late, and why the guest had not been asked to stay; his answer was hysterical, and in his bewilderment he heard: "How could you have brought a man in that condition to your home, to sit at your table, and to meet your wife? Why, he was so intoxicated he could not stand straight; he stammered in his speech—" with these words the tangled knot was cut. Quickly the answer came: "Why, dear, did you not know who he was? What you thought wine was but his mannerisms and idiosyncrasies, characteristics of himself, and born with Mark Twain." There was silence for a moment, and then louder grew the hysterical sobs, muffling and choking the voice: "Mark Twain! Was that Mark Twain! Oh, go after him, go after him; bring him back and tell him, tell him—O, what can you tell him!" But it was not until years afterwards that he was told.

When Bret Harte went East it was natural that he should drift into the society of Mr. and Mrs. Aldrich. He was in receipt of a liberal income, but he was always in financial difficulties through his spendthrift habits. Mrs. Aldrich says:

On a subsequent visit of Mr. Harte's to Boston, I well remember, late on a stormy December night as we were covering with ashes the too bright blaze of the cheerful logs of the living-room fire, the startling sound of the front doorbell, followed by the buoyant, confident tone of Bret Harte at the foot of the stairs, calling: "Are you home, Aldrich? I have come to make a night of it." And then the melodious voice as he ascended the stairs two at a time chanting, "Polly, put the kettle on, Polly put the kettle on, and we'll all have tea." He had been to a dinner and reception given in his honor, and coming gayly into the room he asked for the loan of our spare room for the night, saying that the hotel room was dreary, and that he was in a mood to be happy and gay. We joyfully loaned him the room and the lights—the pajamas and the brushes—and in return he loaned us through all the small hours, until the coming of the dawn, the aroma of his host's choicest cigars. The next morning, still arrayed in his evening clothes he went unembarrassed and airily hotelwards. It may be that our house was for him a palladium that night; for a few evenings afterwards with untroubled charm he spoke to a great audience in Tremont Temple, while a sheriff sat behind a screen and waited. Hurried calls were sent to his publisher, who was dining out and difficult to find, so that the lecture had to be lengthened until the rescuer came, and the cue was given that the last word could now be safely spoken; the all-seeing eye had disappeared, and the chair behind the screen was vacant.

There was a visit to Hartford to see Mark Twain and much exchange of hospitalities. Mrs. Aldrich says truly that never again can there be such talk as scintillated about the table at which sat Howells, Clemens, Aldrich, and Warner:

The next morning, as we were dressing and talking of the pleasant plans of the day, there was a loud and rather authoritative knock at the bedroom door, and Mr. Clemens' voice was heard, saying, "Aldrich, come out, I want to speak to you." The other occupant of the room wrapped her kimono round her more closely, and crept to the door, for evidently something of serious import was happening, or about to happen. The words overheard were most disquieting. Twain's voice had its usual calmness and slowness of speech, but was lacking in the kindly, mellow quality of its accustomed tone, as he said: "In Heaven's name, Aldrich, what are you doing? Are you emulating the kangaroos, with hob-nails in your shoes, or trying the jumping-frog business? Our bedroom is directly under yours, and poor 'Livvy' and her headache—do try to move more quietly, though 'Livvy' would rather suffer than have you give up your game on her account." Then the sound of receding footsteps.

Our consternation was as great as our surprise at the reprimand, for we had been unconscious of walking heavily, or of making unnecessary noise. The bedroom was luxurious in its appointments, the rugs soft on the floor; we could only surmise that the floor boards had some peculiar acoustic quality that emphasized sound. On tiptoe we finished our toilets, and spoke only in whispers, much disturbed in mind that we had troubled our hostess, and hoped she knew that we would not willingly have added to her headache even the weight of a hummingbird's wing. When the toilets were finished, slowly and softly we went down the stairs and into the breakfast room, where, behind the large silver coffee urn, sat Mrs. Clemens. With sorrowful solicitude we asked if her headache was better, and begged forgiveness for adding to her pain. To our amazement she answered, "I have no headache." In perplexed confusion we apologized for the noise we inadvertently made. "Noise!" Mrs. Clemens replied. "We have not heard a sound. If you had shouted we should not have known it, for our rooms are in another wing of the house." At the other end of the table Mark Twain sat, looking as guileless as a combination of cherubim and seraphim—never a word, excepting with lengthened drawl, more slow than usual. "Oh, do come to your breakfast, Aldrich, and don't talk all day."

Mark Twain occupies a considerable part of this book, as is natural enough. We are indebted to it for a personal description that we should be sorry to miss. Mrs. Aldrich says:

Mr. Clemens was at this time thirty-one or two years old; a sparely built man of medium height; a finely shaped, classical head, covered with thick, shaggy, red-colored hair; a mustache of the same tawny hue; eyes which glimmered, keen and twinkling, under overhanging, bushy eyebrows, each hair of which ruffled itself, taking part with unwarrantable intrusion on Mr. Clemens' moods, were they grave or gay. Once, in my remembrance, so belligerent and fierce was their aspect that his listener, who had the temerity to differ with the views he was expressing, begged the privilege of brushing the eyebrows down, that she might have courage to continue with the argument.

Mark Twain had been married four years on the occasion of the Hartford visit, and we have a pleasant description of Olivia Langdon and of her strange courtship by the impetuous Clemens. Also another story:

Out of those far-off days are two indelible pictures in my memories of the last morning and evening of our happy visit: the assembling of the guests at the breakfast table, and while we waited the entrance of our hostess, Mr. Clemens, with sober face and inimitable drawl, telling his night experience, with the orders for the next day. The evening before Mrs. Clemens had been speaking of her consternation in finding she had misspelled a word in a formal note, and said it had always been a great mortification to her that she could not spell; that the sound of a word left her helpless as to the spelling of it, and that, for Mr. Clemens' sake, she should not be allowed to write even the simplest note unless he looked it over. While she was speaking there glimmered and twinkled in Mr. Clemens' eye a laughing imp that hoded mischief. Mr. Clemens said, "I had just fallen into 'the first sweet sleep of dawn,' when this murmur reached my ear: 'Mark, do tell me how to spell sardines.' I replied, 'Livvy, for God's sake, don't let them think down in the city that you are destitute of general information in regard to spelling. How did you spell sardines?' And she told me. Then I got up and opened the window and picked up her poor little scrap of paper, which she had left on the ledge for the market-boy to take in the morning, on which she had written her wish for extra milk, and a small box of sardines. I brought the bit of paper to the bedside and said, 'Here, Love, is your pen and ink. Just put an "h" at the end of your sardines, then we can both lie down in peace to sleep, and in the morning when the market-man reads your paper, he will know you know how to spell the fish, although the "h" is always silent.' And God forever bless her! she wrote it. But if she ever discovers that in that spelling I was wrong, why, the china and I will fly."

Almost innumerable are the stories told by Mrs. Aldrich and the memories of the great that crowd into her mind. There was the visit to England and the many meetings with literary and artistic celebrities, and among them, Irving, Ellen Terry, and Mme. Bernhardt:

It was delightful to see Mme. Bernhardt and Miss Terry together, each so unlike, both equally fascinating. Mme. Bernhardt had gone early in the evening to Miss Terry's dressing-room. Not finding her there, she had written on the white napkin of her toilet table, "Ellen Terry, my darling," that being as near as her French tongue could surmount the spelling of "darling." Miss Terry said she had cut the dear message out and should have it framed. "Fussy," Mr. Irving's little dog, was much in evidence that night at the supper, dividing his attentions with impartiality between the two queens of the feast, traversing over the table the distance that separated him from the strawberry ice-cream of Mme. Bernhardt's plate and the "tutti-frutti" of Miss Terry's. The friendship between Fussy and his master was very intense, the companionship inseparable. And although Fussy was content to receive the adulation of the entire theatrical company, his true allegiance was solely to Mr. Irving himself.

Mrs. Aldrich brings her book to a close with the death of Mr. Aldrich in 1907. It is distinctly one of the books of the day, not only for the people of whom it speaks, but for its fine style and delicate feeling.

CROWDING MEMORIES. By Mrs. Thomas Bailey Aldrich. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $5.

It was a wonderful sapphire, so it is said, that led the celebrated Dr. Sorby to the discovery of the nature of the liquid sometimes found enclosed in the cavities of crystals. The gem in question contained a tube-shaped cavity a quarter of an inch long and an eighteenth of an inch in diameter, which was so regular in its bore that it served, by means of the liquid partially filling it, for a thermometer. The contained liquid half filled the bore at 50 degrees Fahrenheit and completely filled it at 80 degrees. A study of the rate of expansion of the liquid led to the conclusion that it must be carbonic acid.

The pearl industry has taken up the X-ray as a money saver. The oysters are radiographed without the shells being opened, and those containing no pearls are not considered. Those showing signs of small pearls are put back to give the jewel a chance to grow up.

Cigarette smoking is on the increase all over the world, according to a census of the industry. In 1919 39,000,000,000 "coffin nails" were smoked in the United States and more than 16,000,000,000 were exported.

The eligible voters of the United States number 29,000,000 men and 26,000,000 women.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

The San Francisco Clearing House Association reported clearings for the week ended Saturday at $172,900,000, compared with $169,700,000 for the corresponding week last year. Saturday's clearings were $23,700,000.

Gold reserves in the Twelfth Federal Reserve District increased $1,217,000 during the week, according to the comparative statement of conditions made public by the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco Saturday. Total gold reserves last week were reported at $166,155,000, of which $58,311,000 is held by banks in the district, comparing with $53,448,000 on October 15th. Reserves increased from $163,358,000 last week to $166,560,000. The total of bills on hand is reported at $223,625,000, compared with $223,305,000, and hands of receivers. These companies were in the same position in which the railroads found themselves, and now that they are emerging into a new period of prosperity the securities of those companies that have been able to weather the storm at all are in line for marked improvement.

So far as these stocks are concerned, however, any excess buying enthusiasm will be quickly chilled, just as has been the case in the railroads, for it has been proclaimed again and again in the very highest financial quarters that there is no money that can be spared for mere speculation.

The trend of most stocks seems downward, in view of the financial circumstances. Bank loans have swollen enormously with high-priced commodities as direct or indirect collateral for the large proportion of these obligations, and it has been impossible to compel liquidation fast enough to prevent very serious losses here and there.

We are going through an upheaval in the business world that means the toppling over of the inverted pyramids of speculative enterprise and a general shaking down or readjustment in which many weakly-established firms will fall and probably not a few that may have been looked upon as bulwarks in their particular lines will be found to have been greatly overrated.

The "last leg" of a bear market in securities is generally the worst break of the whole movement, culminating in what seems like taking the bottom out of the market. Should the present market act true to form in this particular we will not have to wait very long before this situation culminates and one would do well to try to be in position to take advantage of the opportunities then resulting to buy good stocks at bargain-counter prices. —The Trader.

The biblical term of threescore years and ten will, in the opinion of a writer in the Annalist, mark the era of legislative regulation of railroad fares by our several states. It began with New York's 3-cent fare law of 1850 and ceases with the Interstate Commerce Commission's domination over intrastate fares implicit in the Esch-Cummins law, acknowledged by many state authorities and thought likely to be confirmed by the United States Supreme Court. This writer, Mr. D. J. Ettrude, feels sure that the various appeals made to the Interstate Commerce Commission by carriers against state commissions insisting on low intrastate fares marks the beginning of the end. "In the Shreveport rate case in 1914 the Supreme Court found that the Interstate Commerce Commission rulings were the supreme regulations even over intrastate rates, when there was a resulting discrimination. So, with the enlarged powers, particularly of appeal from the state commissions, granted under the Transportation Act of 1920 to the Federal commission, there can be no doubt that the interpretation will be a liberal one." Mr. Ettrude gives the history and present status of state fare regulation as follows:

"Seventy years—1850 to 1920—covers the rise and fall of legislative passenger rates in the United States, for it was in 1850 that the New York state legislature enacted the law, still on the statute-books, although superseded by the public service law, restricting railroad fares to 3 cents a mile. It was New York, too, that introduced the 2-cent fare when, in 1869, as the price for consolidation of several roads into the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, the new company was prohibited from ever charging more than 2 cents a mile for carrying passengers. And it was this law that the public service commission at Albany cited when it ordered the New York Central to resume 2-cent fares on the end of government control.

"For years the standard of 3 cents set by New York was the amount required by the laws passed. Michigan in 1873, Iowa in 1874, and Ohio and Maryland in 1876 were among the first states to prescribe a limit of 3 cents. West Virginia, however, in 1872-73, by a detailed classification of railroads and length of trip, provided for fares ranging from 2.7 cents to 5 cents a mile. At the same time Virginia still kept her old law of 1837, which provided that during the first thirty years of a railroad's existence it should earn a return of 15 per cent, while New Mexico provided, in 1878, that no road should charge more than 10 cents a mile, and that no road should be required to lower its rates unless the company were making more than 10 per cent. on the cost of construction and equipment.

"New York's 2-cent fare went for years without being followed in other states, although in 1897 a 2-cent law was proposed in Missouri. It was Ohio, however, which set the match to the powder that produced the 2-cent flurry of 1907, for, in 1906, that state adopted a 2-cent limit, and was followed the next year by twelve other states, Arkansas, Illinois, Iowa, Indiana, Kansas, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, Oklahoma (by Constitution), and Wisconsin, and Pennsylvania and West Virginia, the two Eastern states that had their laws declared unconstitutional by the courts. In the same year the Virginia corporation commission made a 2-cent limit by commission regulation, and a 2½-cent fare was adopted by Alabama, New Hampshire, North Carolina, North Dakota, and South Dakota.

"At the present time a majority of the states regulate passenger fares by commission, but there are twenty states that are operating under restrictive state laws, in each of which states the commission can also require lower rates than the limit set by law. Tabulated, the kinds of regulation are as follows:

No commission or legislation.....	1
By commission.....	26
Two-cent law.....	9
Two-and-a-half-cent law.....	4
Three-cent law.....	7
Four-cent law.....	1
Total.....	48

"The states which regulate by commission are: California (1915), Colorado (1910), Connecticut, Florida (1899), Georgia (1878-79), Idaho (1913), Indiana (1919, repealed 2-cent law of 1907), Kentucky (with 2½-cent law still on the books), Maine (1913), Massachusetts (1869), Mississippi (prior to 1880), Nevada (1909), New Hampshire (1883), New Jersey (1911, repealed 3-cent law of 1903), New York (1910, supersedes 3-cent law of 1850, still on the books), Oklahoma (1907), Oregon (1907), Pennsylvania (1913, 2-cent law of 1907 unconstitutional), Rhode Island (1912), South Dakota (1911, repealed 2½-cent law of 1907), Tennessee (1897), Utah (1917), Vermont (1906), Virginia (1906), Washington (1911, repealed 3-cent law of 1905), and Wyoming (1915).

"The 2½-cent fare states are: Alabama (1907), Michigan (1919, amending 3-cent law of 1873 and 2-cent law of 1907), North Carolina (1907), and North Dakota (1907). Three cents is by law the maximum in Arizona (1913), Kansas (1907), Louisiana (1890), Maryland (1876), Montana (1905), South Carolina (1900, amending 3¼-cent law of 1896), and Texas (1883). In addition New Mexico, by a law of 1882, allows a limit of 6 cents, an amendment to the law of 1878 that allowed 10 cents, while Delaware has not an iota of a regulation of railroad fares."

rate-making statutes and the powers of railroad commissions. So far, but two states with legal restriction on passenger fares have granted the Interstate Commerce Commission's rate to the railways, in other cases appeals have been taken to the commission.

Under the caption, "Business Situation," the Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Los Angeles has the following to say in its monthly financial letter:

"Business is still running on a partially deflated tire. Where there was once a vacuum, all of a sudden, in many lines, there seems to be an oversupply of manufactured goods. Where, a few months ago, buyers were bidding for service, they now stand off and want inducements to purchase. How much of this is psychological, no one can tell. This situation results, briefly, from the following facts:

"Ever since the signing of the armistice, in 1918, the people of the United States have exercised high-handed brigandage against each other. The foundation, therefore, was laid in 1916 in the passage of the Adamson Act.

Under this act the number of railroad employees was increased over three hundred thousand and their wages were at once enormously increased, and have since been further advanced.

"The huge advances in wages to the railroad employees, coupled with the shortage of man power resulting from the mobilizing of our armies for overseas service, enabled all other labor to follow the example of the railroad employees. Shortened hours of service, less efficiency, and constantly increased wages resulted. Production was thereby seriously decreased. The manufacturers, the merchants, the distributors, finding a ready market for everything they could lay their hands on, by bidding against each other for labor, added still more to its inefficiency and excessive cost. Cost of production and distribution was thereby greatly increased. This increased cost, with an ample allowance to cover all contingencies, was passed on to the ultimate consumer. As a result every necessity of life sold for unheard-of prices. No doubt business men, pleading as an excuse the excess profits tax, have taken advantage of the situation to hoist prices far above normal and far beyond any necessary level. In other words, they voluntarily joined the ranks of the profiteers. They were every bit as avaricious as labor. The result has been that we have had an immense inflation in the money volume of business, with higher prices prevailing than were ever known in American history.

"The business policy of the country has been for everybody to charge all the traffic would bear, and then some. The practice has been universal. There has been no exception. The disease seems to have gotten into the blood of the business world."

Bringing employees into corporations as shareholders is becoming more popular as a means of preventing labor troubles and giving the workers a personal interest in the companies by which they are employed. The General Electric Company's stockholders have been called to authorize the proposed sale of shares in the company to employees, to an amount not exceeding 50,000 shares. In issuing the call for the meeting we learn from Bradstreet's, C. A. Coffin, chairman of the board, explains that the directors have long regarded ownership of stock by employees as highly desirable, not only as a means of investing their savings, but of creating a direct and personal interest in the company's welfare. The chairman points out, however, that acquisition of such stock by employees in a large way is not practicable, except through some arrangement permitting purchases on the installment plan. Until recently the company has been unable to adopt such a plan because stock was not available for the purpose. But under the New York Stock Corporation Law, as amended in 1919, a corporation, with the stockholders' approval, may now sell stock to its employees. Therefore "it is under the provisions of that statute that the General Electric Company proposes to sell shares of its authorized and unissued capital stock to its employees. The subscription price, it is announced, will be substantially the market price at the time the offer is made, payment to be made by periodical deductions from the pay-roll. To make the plan as simple as possible and to avoid unnecessary detail, no allowance or adjustment will be made for interest either on payments or on unpaid balances, but upon completion of the subscription the company will give credit to the employee representing approximately the net return had been an actual holder of the stock and received the dividends thereon from the date of his subscription. Should a subscription be canceled because of illness, unemployment, or other reason, the employee will receive back whatever sum may have been deducted from his wages, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum; certificates of stock, of course, will not be delivered until the subscription payments have been completed."

The new issue of $1,000,000 Province of British Columbia three-year 6 per cent. gold bonds, purchased Monday by a syndicate headed by Carstens & Earles, Inc., was placed upon the market Wednesday morning at a basis to yield 7.30 per cent.

The bonds are due October 25, 1923. Principal and semi-annual interest are payable in American funds at the Canadian Bank of Commerce, New York City.

British Columbia ranks third in size among the Canadian provinces. Its area is 227,200,000 acres, of which 180,000,000 acres are forest covered. In natural resources, it is one of the wealthiest of the provinces. The assessed property valuation in the province is reported at $801,407,628, while its total funded debt, including this issue, is $42,571,936, which, less a sinking fund of $6,184,383, leaves a net funded debt of $36,387,553. The current revenue for the year ended March 31, 1920, was $12,605,274, or $2,521,429 more than the expenditures for the same period. The population is estimated at 450,000.

E. H. Rollins & Sons are offering $1,000,000 Junior Orpheum San Francisco first (closed) mortgage 7 per cent. serial gold bonds. Coupon bonds in denomination of $100, $500, and $1000. Exempt from personal property tax in California.

Junior Orpheum San Francisco, recently incorporated under the laws of California, owns a lot containing approximately 24,570 square feet, having frontages on Taylor Street and Golden Gate Avenue, appraised at $750,000.

It also owns and conveys to this trust a ninety-nine-year lease of approximately 1900 square feet on the corner of Taylor Street and Golden Gate Avenue. It will erect on the property a theatre and seven-story store and loft or office building of modern first-class construction. The funds received by the company from the sale of these bonds become part of the mortgaged property until disbursed for this purpose. It is estimated the building, excluding furnishing, will cost $1,000,000. Should the funds received by the company from the sale of these bonds exceed the final cost of the building, the difference will be used to immediately retire these bonds.

Mr. Blankenhorn of the Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company returned recently from a three weeks' visit to the Eastern financial centers. He is optimistic over the manner in which the many huge bond offerings have been absorbed by the public, and is confident that the period of retrenchment now being experienced throughout the United States will leave the country in a much more stabilized condition.

Conditions in the bond market were never better. This, he asserts, is evidenced by the absorption of the big issues recently put on the market by the largest industrial firms in the country. The manner in which they were taken up and oversubscribed is the best index available, he said.

After the first of the coming year interest rates will begin to decrease, Mr. Blankenhorn believes. This will be the result of two factors, he said. The marketing of the recent enormous issues has enabled the larger concerns to secure what capital they need for expansion in the immediate future. Consequently money will become easier and interest rates will again seek their normal trend. The other factor is the gradual steadying down of business, the lowering of commodity prices, with the natural falling off of money rates.

Two Books of Travel.

"Wanderings," by Richard Curle, is a book in which is embodied in words that vague search by the confirmed traveler for a magic something which is expressed by Mr. Curle in his introduction when he asks, "Who would not watch the pageant of strange lands, walk the alien cities, smell the odors of the jungle?"

The book is a sort of exultant reminiscence of impressions gained in youth from distant lands, random notes in which the delight of wandering afar and tasting the characteristic savor of strange places has expressed itself in passages which show the cultured individualist.

Jamaica, Spain, Rhodesia, Guiana, Cape Town, the West Indies, Johannesburg, Peru, Westernmost Africa, are some of the places discussed, together with impressions gained in the great capitals of Europe.

The book is preëminently one for the retired or intending traveler to enjoy, as it is merely a series of random impressions enjoyable to assimilate because of the author's keen sense of enjoyment.

"The Shadow-Show," evidently by a kinsman of the same author, is much the same kind of book, save that Mr. J. H. Curle seeks to convey what he has gathered of the predominant characteristics of different peoples. In the order for his liking for them he ranks the American first, the Scandinavian, the Chinese, the Jew.

Of his own people, the British, he says: "Our balance, our personality, our wealth, bring us the respect of all peoples." Balance, he considers, is the secret of British prestige.

"A showman," Mr. Curle calls himself, who has "stood in the wings all my life and have seen the mounting of a thousand tableaux." And it is in this spirit that he chronicles his impressions of the peoples, the places, and humanity in the general that he has met in perpetual travel.

THE SHADOW-SHOW. By J. H. Curle. New York: George H. Doran Company.

Mainwaring.

Mr. Hewlett has usually written of noble people. At least he has chosen noble people for the centre of his stage. That he should now choose an uninteresting rascal is a little disappointing.

Mainwaring fails to convince us. We meet him first of all in Marseilles, down at heel and shabby, but with that conviction of destiny that comes sometimes to good and bad alike. Then we find Mainwaring in England maintaining by his eccentricities a precarious position in aristocratic circles. The strike at Culgaith gives him his opportunity. He becomes a strike leader and a demagogue. He plays the part without even the sincerity of an actor on the stage. He is violent, brutal, unscrupulous. He inspires contempt, but he never rises to the level of hatred. Elected to Parliament, he wins one shadowy triumph after another until the bubble collapses. It is a wonder that it survives so long. Mainwaring is not bad enough to be worth three hundred pages of Maurice Hewlett. It is too much space for a man who is wholly despicable.

Of course there are other characters, but they are unimportant with the exception of Mainwaring's wife, Lizzie, and Lizzie is as unreal as Mainwaring himself. She is a daughter of the people, her father a carter, her mother a washerwoman, but Lizzie shows no trace of her humble source. Her speech is faultless, her manners irreproachable, her beauty perfect. She marries Mainwaring because she believes in his championship of her class. She cleaves loyally to him when she discovers that he is no more than one of those fanatical charlatans who begin by deceiving others and end by believing their own pretenses.

MAINWARING. By Maurice Hewlett. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

Jailed for Freedom.

Miss Doris Stevens speaks much of martyrdom in her volume describing the militancy of the suffragettes and the sufferings that resulted from their violations of the law. Doubtless her narrative will have its effect upon the emotionalism that takes the place of intelligence and that subverts the judicial faculty. It is to be feared that many minds will remain wholly unmoved by personal affronts offered to the President of the United States, but that will be fanned to a white heat of indignation by a pitiful story of a soap shortage at Occoquan Workhouse and by horrid revelations of prison bed sheets that left something to be desired in the way of cleanliness.

We are frankly unable to find any story of martyrdom in these pages. It may be that our vision is obscured by a memory of the real martyrs of history who suffered the last refinements of human cruelty without complaint or protest. Many of these women broke the law impudently and persistently. They brought the law into contempt. They advocated and practiced anarchy. They offered personal insult to the President of the United States. They had themselves photographed in the act, and they now publish those photographs. They did more to popularize anarchy than any of the demented wretches that have been deported. All these things might conceivably be tolerable if we were living under the reign of a Caligula, but that the offenders should then weep and wail over the prison soap and the prison bed sheets is not tolerable. That such hysteria as this should receive the applause of public men and women is evidence of an emotional dementia that must be counted among the disquieting signs of the times.

JAILED FOR FREEDOM. By Doris Stevens. New York: Boni & Liveright.

Essays on Family Life.

"Endicott and I," by Frances Lester Warner, is a collection of this author's popular essays that have been printed in the leading magazines and now appear as a literary unit. For it is a family group, with all its individual idiosyncrasies indulgently summarized, that is outlined; its adventures with a pet dog, with learning chess, with going fishing, with gardening, and economizing, and swimming, all these various activities presided over by Endicott, the ruler of the family, like "a Rodin statue of authority," and by Endicott's wife, a being all womanliness, and motherliness, and gentle humor; while the just-grown-up Endicotts supply the indispensable family element of youth.

ENDICOTT AND I. By Frances Lester Warner. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.25.

Santayana's Essays.

Mr. Pearsall Smith has selected one hundred and fourteen extracts from Mr. Santayana's works and he has done it so skillfully that we may welcome the book as a presentation of the author's philosophy and as likely to prove in every way satisfactory to those who have no time for a more extended study. Mr. Smith submitted his work to Mr. Santayana himself, who not only approved it, but made certain changes. It may therefore be regarded as authoritative.

LITTLE ESSAYS: DRAWN FROM THE WRITINGS OF GEORGE SANTAYANA. By Logan Pearsall Smith. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $3.

Briefer Reviews.

Charles Scribner's Sons have published "Jesus' Principles of Living," by Charles Foster Kent, Ph. D., Litt. D., and Jeremiah Whipple Jenks, Ph. D., LL. D.

An attractive story of a dog, told in the first person, will be found in "A Terrier's Tale," by Elisabeth Gray Meredith. There are whimsical illustrations and the publisher is the Houghton Mifflin Company. Price, $1.

The International Book Publishing Company has published a two-volume edition of Tolstoy's "Resurrection," translated by Archibald J. Wolfe. A useful feature of the new edition is a key and a glossary to Russian names.

"The Airplane Spider," by Gilbert Murray (Little, Brown & Co.), is a story of a tarantula inappropriately named Laura. The tarantula in spite of his evil life is an entertaining creature at a distance and little children will thoroughly enjoy this story of her ways. The little book is illustrated.

"A Prairie Schooner Princess," by Mary Katherine Maule (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company), is a novel of the time of the civil war. The "princess" is a beautiful young girl found under dramatic circumstances by a family crossing the plains in a "prairie schooner." The mystery of her family leads to tragic happenings as she grows into womanhood, and a romance with some tangled threads develops.

"Injun and Whitey," by William S. Hart (Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.90), is a tale of the adventures on a Montana cattle ranch of a white boy and his Indian chum, of how Whitey learns to ride, shoot man-fashion, of their capture by a band of cattle-rustlers, and of how they escaped and turned the tables by rounding up the band after a series of desperate and exciting adventures.

"Little Folks Tramping and Camping," by Anna Blunt Morgan (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company), is the story of a family of real children and their experiences in learning to know their native birds. Some of the incidents are funny, some pathetic, some tragic, in a child's eyes at least, and all the more important ones actually happened. An uncle, who is as companionable as he is wise and scholarly, offers a prize to the child seeing the greatest variety of birds during the summer. The story relates their happy times and the funny troubles they get into on their tramps and in their camp, trying to win the prize.

One of the most notable literary events of the year will occur next week, when the long-awaited new novel by Edith Wharton, entitled "The Age of Innocence," is published by D. Appleton & Co. This is the first full-length novel that Mrs. Wharton has written in several years.

Kermit Roosevelt, author of "The Happy Hunting-Grounds" (Scribners), which is largely a story of his adventures in Africa and South America with his distinguished father, is now devoting much of his time to commercial enterprise in New York.

Japan's Foreign Policy.

A public willing only to hear the placid assurance that "God's in His heaven, all's right with the world," will not smile upon such an exposure of Japan's foreign policies as has been given to us by Mr. A. M. Pooley. Japan, we are constantly told by our optimists, has no cause for quarrel with America. Japan, we are told, is mindful of her "traditional friendship" for America. In such ways do we content our souls, wholly believing that the unwelcome must also be the untrue. But Mr. Pooley waves a dispersing wand over our illusions. He speaks of Japanese unrest "almost amounting to hatred and which at times swells to such a point as to bring the possibility of a war well into view." Moreover, he sustains his opinions by citations and evidence that it is impossible to ignore.

Japan, says Mr. Pooley, intends to dominate Asia. She will do whatever is necessary to that aim and she will fight all who oppose that aim. She will play in Asia the part that Germany tried to play in Europe. Momentarily checked in China, there are other fields open to her and notably India. Mr. Pooley considers it certain that she tried to make an alliance with Mexico and in order to embarrass America. President Wilson played directly into the hands of Japan when he refused to recognize Huerta, who was "just the man for the job . . . and Japan generally was bigly delighted to see the States getting further and further entangled." These are not the mere assertions of a partisan. The array of documents, speeches, and facts is exhaustive.

It is not possible to summarize Mr. Pooley's book. He is an Englishman, but he believes that American and British policies should here coincide. He devotes a chapter to the Anglo-Japanese alliance, another to the Japanese policy in China, and another to the Mexican situation. Those who wish to understand the problem farther and deeper than the mere snarling with which we are becoming unpleasantly familiar will find here a presentation that leaves nothing to be desired at the points of clarity and precision.

In the House of Another.

It must be decidedly disquieting to awake after an accident and to find yourself in a body that is not your own. This is what happened to Una when she came to herself after the automobile collision that had deprived her of consciousness and was unable to recognize either the room in which she was lying or the reflection of her own face in the mirror. Moreover, a cautious exploration of the field reveals to her that she has a husband, although her memory supplies no clue to such an acquisition—decidedly a most embarrassing situation and one that is handled by the author with much ingenuity.

"RUDDIGORE."

This Gilbert and Sullivan piece classes itself with the three—"The Gondoliers," "The Yeomen of the Guard," and "Ruddigore" itself—that never attained to the popularity won by the inimitable five: "Pinafore," "Iolanthe," "The Pirates of Penzance," "Patience," and "The Mikado." It was said of "Ruddigore" that the British public conceived a prejudice against it on account of its title, the well-known British antagonism to any word suggestive of gore having deep and sensitive roots.

Indeed, an attempt was made to have the name pronounced "Rud-dig-o-re" in London, with what success I do not know. The whole thing sounds like a joke, but that is the story that was extant "a many years ago."

"Ruddigore" we are now seeing for the first time in this city, the Players Club having given the production of the opera a particularly careful preparation, for they had no initiative to go on. We have had here all the five greater pieces many times: in the dim past, with revivals in the middle distance and still later ones to attest the astonishing vitality of these ever fresh and inexhaustibly amusing burlesques, which are fountains of delicious melody and springs of ever-hubbling humor.

We are now seeing "Ruddigore" under very favorable conditions; for the company at the Players Club are giving performances that musically are a treat and that from the standpoint of burlesque acting are done with professional poise and with the stamp of that freshness of feeling, that devotion to the common good, and that joyous zest in doing a congenial task that characterize the work of such organizations. And still I recognize that it is not equal in merit to the five greater ones. Both Gilbert and Sullivan had begun to lose spontaneity of output, and the exuberance of the Gilbertian humor in this opera is appreciably lessened.

But one could never mistake "Ruddigore" for other than a Gilbert and Sullivan opera. Although the earlier musical numbers lack the free melodious flow so familiar to us, Sir Arthur evidently had warmed to his task as the work went on, and there are several charming lyrics and a number of beautiful choruses; for Sir Arthur's muse seemed to be in a more placating mood when he tackled the choruses.

"Ruddigore" is a burlesque on the old-style melodramatic opera, just as "The Pirates of Penzance" is. There is a had haronet with the murderous name of Sir Despard Murgatroyd; a phenomenally innocent village maid, another whose wits have gone awry on account of the wickedness of the murderous Murgatroyd, and so on. The chorus of girls consists of professional bridesmaids and the men are the ghosts of the numerous defunct Murgatroyds, upon whose house rests a cu-u-u-se.

Miriam Elkus makes a pretty and artless village maid, her Rose Maybud singing—and speaking as well—in a voice of fresh spring-time sweetness appropriate to Rose's naïveté and to her huddling charms. Mrs. Elkus, too, caught the spirit of the comedy, prettily depicting Rose's literalness. Mahel Gump plays the rôle of Mad Margaret, whose wits have gone askew because of the heart-ohduracy of the wicked haronet. Mrs. Gump, in a very becoming Ophelia get-up, made much of the rôle, which, like that of Sir Despard, is not any too easy to get over. She put into the madness of Margaret the élan of a bubbling temperament which lent itself with vigor to the task, and her burlesqueries bore the genuine stamp; so much so that the hilarious audience hated to see Mad Margaret make an exit, and welcomed her return.

Jane Parent's task was, as an ancient spinster up in the annals of the village, to tell the story of the curse, which she did, with melodramatic eye-rollings and with due respect for the value of the Gilbertian lines.

Benjamin Purrington and Easton Kent added to the general gaiety by appearing as the two foster-brothers competing for the complaisant hand of the fair but fleeting Rose Maybud. Mr. Purrington sings agreeably, and Easton Kent, a stripling with a boy's slender figure and irrepressible smile, delighting as a vocalist with a fine, powerful tenor voice and as an actor who threw himself with youthful ardor into the rôle of the jolly sailor lad.

Mr. Reginald Travers as the wicked baronet ran up against the framework of a Gilbertian burlesque rôle without a due equipment of the Gilbertian humor. Sir Despard is very much to the fore in his big scene, in which Mr. Travers exhibited due energy of action, but somehow Gilbert brought the character close to that narrow verge which separates what is funny and what ought to be and isn't. The conception was there in Gilbert's mind, but his brain was losing its cunning and he couldn't develop it humorously as he did corresponding characters in the other operas. However, Mr. Travers had some chance in the sapolio scene, and as he is good at burlesquing he won through.

The main part of the vocalism of the piece rested in the capable hands of Miriam Elkus, of Easton Kent—who alternates with Harry Coles—and Len Barnes, a young man with a good presence and a fine haritone, he also being in alternating rôle.

There is an excellent chorus singing with full volume and sweet tone; so much so that I rebel at the discords introduced in the bridesmaids' chorus to create a laugh; a very poor device always, I think.

The opera goes with great spirit, the costumes and setting are appropriate, the acting and the hurlesquing very enjoyable, and the musical side of a difficult performance well carried through.

And we should not forget to appreciate the hard and telling work of those two invisibles, George Edwards as musical director and of Fred Carlyle, who made his plastic subjects, collectively and individually, take their dancing steps like professionals.

"THE FAITH-HEALER."

This play of William Vaughn Moody's was written after the author had made a success with "The Great Divide," but it never attained to a genuine popular success. It was played in 1910 at St. Louis, at Cambridge, and at New York, and then faded out of the public eye.

Henry Miller revived it recently in the East; for during these uncertain times theatre managers do not dare to venture on the costly risk of bringing out new plays. Mr. Maitland, in pursuance of his policy of putting on notable plays—for many men of letters have passed favorable comment on the play—and in recognition of a desire often felt to see what New York sees, is running "The Faith Healer" this week.

Mr. Maitland has cast his company with discretion, and they deserve commendation for their work, for the piece is not an easy one to interpret. It is semi-poetic, and poetic diction always means a certain abeyance of action while eloquently written lines are repeated. There is also a symbolic character intended; the fog, the fakir's rope, the picture on the mantel shelf, and other allusions having a spiritual significance; and spiritualism is not easy to convey. And then the lofty spiritual character of the Faith-Healer; that is difficult for even a supreme artist to suggest. I know that the sole time I saw Forbes-Rohertson in "The Passing of the Third Floor Back" he failed, perhaps through weariness, to affect the imagination sufficiently to give the illusion of a divine aura. Michaelis, of course, is not supposed to be divine, or even semi-divine. But he is supposed to have his powers for healing strengthened through divine agency.

Some writer has said that Moody went astray over his idea. But the trouble seems to be that the play has too much talk and too little action, and the imagination is too heavily taxed in compassing the spiritual idea. Sir Henry Arthur Jones has always believed in introducing religion into the drama, finding there a rich field for contrasting the sincere Christian, even though he may be a zealot, with the hypocrite. In many of his plays he has had clergyman characters play a prominent part. But the public has never taken kindly to placing a man of God in the most prominent rôle in a play, and what the public fails to approve—even admitting that the public often shows poor taste—is what goes under. Perhaps it is because holy men conflict with the idea of pleasure, and a theatre is a place of enjoyment; but personally I believe that the trouble with "The Faith-Healer" is that there is something dangerously near to dismalness in the play. Also, Moody failed to make his healer intrinsically interesting.

Furthermore, a play that has such an abundance of dialogue, all, or nearly all, of a sombre nature—for Moody did not know how to mellow his plays with the touch of homely humor that makes the whole world kind—results almost inevitably in causing the players to fall into monotonous cadences; which means being unlikable, for in the homely doings and sayings of life we never express ourselves monotonously. Thus "The Faith-Healer" stands half-way between poetic and life-like drama, but is not quite either.

However, Mr. Maitland gave a very creditable impersonation of the Healer, his appearance hearing out the author's conception and his lines being well rendered. Hélène Marchand was gentle and refined as the invalid, thoroughly satisfying in conception, Mr. Lancaster was natural as the homely farmer, and Caroline Howard perfectly so as the snappish, drudging sister, and Mary Morris with her emotional voice and girlish appearance fell into the picture. The remaining rôles were satisfactorily assumed by Messrs. Allard, Miller, and Horton, Clarisse Russell playing the young mother. Next week we will see in Galsworthy's "Justice" how much more dramatically and interestingly the English author can treat a sombre theme.

"TOO MANY HUSBANDS."

W. Somerset Maugham is a money-getter in the field of play-writing, and therefore he turns out pot-boilers ever so often. The comedy at the Alcazar is a case in point. It is the lightest piece of froth, but the froth of an experienced writer who knows how to make bright, quick repartee and the clever contrivance of amusing situations atone for the lack of high spirits and spontaneity.

The comedy recognizes that we have had a war by arranging a complication resulting from the war; a complication that no doubt truly reflects a number of similar happenings.

A returned soldier marries the widow of his dearest pal, who has been reported from the war office as having been killed.

The wife—or widow—or bride—is a pretty, clinging creature who "darlings" the various members of her family plentifully, although noticeably deficient in giving any practical testimony of the affection and solicitude so gracefully expressed. So when Husband I returns to find Husband II in possession, and the two begin an amicable, partly concealed, but eventually open contest for the privilege of standing from under and giving way to the other fellow, it gradually penetrates that the pretty Victoria, for all her grace and beauty

Lake Honda Reservoir

"Lake Honda will be remembered as the sheet of water about one mile back of the Mission Hills where that terrible catastrophe occurred in 1855, by which the families of Mr. Oppenheimer and another merchant perished." —Daily Morning Call, April 5, 1861.

The natural lake called Honda (deep) had to be drained before the reservoir was built in 1861 and 1862 by the Spring Valley Water Works. The original reservoir was remodeled and enlarged in 1865.

This reservoir at Seventh Avenue and Noriega Street is situated in a Spring Valley tract of 46½ acres adjoining Forest Hill. It is 370 feet above sea level, the highest of the big distributing reservoirs in San Francisco. Its capacity 45 million gallons. It receives water from Lake Pilaquito and Lake San Andres in San Mateo County, and from Lake Merced.

Honda supplies "high service" sections of San Francisco—that is to say, sections which are between 250 and 350 feet above sea level. There are higher sections in the city, but water is pumped to them. Honda water flows by gravity to the Western Addition and the Richmond District.

"There is much to feed the eye of fancy along the road that leads to Honda, and something, withal, to touch the sense of grosser speculation. After leaving Hayes' Valley, the road to the Lake passes through narrow valleys and over sandy hills studded with chaparral, and we presume peppered with fleas."—Rollin M. Daggett, writing in 1861.

and clinging—too clinging ways—has, as a wife, been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

In fact, not to put too fine a point upon it, the fluffy Victoria bores her two husbands. Now a husband will endure a wife that bores provides she makes him comfortable, just as a wife will endure a husband that bores provided he sets her up in furs, and fleshpots, and things. But when the wife is merely a pretty kitten on the hearth, purring and arching a graceful back to be stroked, and complacently setting white teeth in the fare provided by some one else—when the cook leaves, then—sometimes—if unless she's a real a genuine bewitcher—then the services of the divorce court are invoked.

This, then, is the comedy; the return of Husband I, the amiable competition between Husbands I and II, and the eventual appearance of an applicant for the position of Husband III, who, we surmise, will soon be rather rueful under the weight of the graceful clinger on his back.

The new leading lady, Elwyn Harvey, makes her first appearance this week in the rôle of the wife, in which she is revealed as pretty, graceful, sweet-voiced, and highly satisfactory as an actress; in this light rôle, at least. Miss Harvey has an expressive face, and she is careful never to sit by and look on, her features mirroring the emotions she is supposed to feel, even when some other player has the floor.

This job of being leading lady in a stock theatre is no light one, the last but one incumbent during her year's engagement playing such widely diverse rôles as that of a woman of seventy and a girl of fifteen, and being obliged to jump into farce, comedy, melodrama, crook drama, rural drama, and society drama by turns. It is valuable and developing experience, and we will sit back with a judicial air and a feeling of alert and proprietary interest to see how well the new leading lady will tackle her job.

Mr. Ben Erway is being brought forward more and more, and stands the white light well. He plays a rôle equal in importance to that of Dudley Ayres, Brady Kline playing the part of Husband-to-be III with just that suggestion of a dash of unscrupulousness about him that gives the spectator a comfortable feeling that he and Victoria are going to have their just deserts.

The remaining rôles were assumed by Emelie Melville, as a calculating mother with a shrewd eye out for the main chance for daughter; Anna McNaughton, as a business-like maid; Emily Pinter, as a flamboyant charmer, and two or three others, the company making a good appearance in the English comedy, to whose humor they did ample justice.

The Curran Theatre.

Harbach and Friml's new musical comedy, "The Little Whopper," which opens at the Curran Theatre tomorrow night for a limited engagement of two weeks, is the joint effort of three men whose names are already eminent in the field of stage entertainment, and who are credited with reaching their climaxes in "The Little Whopper." Book and music are by Otto Harbach and Rudolf Friml, who also wrote "The Firefly," "High Jinks," "Kalinka," "You're in Love," and "Tumble In."

Among the musical numbers that have become highly popular are "Oh, What a Little Whopper," "Round the Corner," "Twinkle Little Star," "I've Got to Leave You," "I'm Lonely When I'm Alone," "If You Go I'll Die," "Sweet Dreams," and "There's Only One Thing to Do."

A chorus of pretty girls rounds out a company which includes some of the best-known entertainers on the American stage.

McIntyre and Heath in "Hello, Alexander," will conclude their engagement at the Curran Theatre with the performance this evening.

The Columbia Theatre.

Reginald De Koven's comic opera "Robin Hood," revived on a scale of great singing quality by Ralph Dunbar, will be the attraction at the Columbia Theatre for two weeks commencing with Monday night, November 1st. The old English tale of Robin Hood and his band of outlaws is a famous one, and their merry pranks in Sherwood Forest have furnished Sir Walter Scott and other writers with stories that will live forever. De Koven has given America a great opera. The many big numbers are sung with delightful effect by the cast, and the chorus is one said to be fitted for the many features falling to it for presentation. Albert Parr will be seen in the title-rôle and Alan-a-Dale will be sung by Betty Baxter, a charming young contralto. Tom Burton is the Sheriff of Nottingham and William White, Friar Tuck. Elsie Thiede in the rôle of Maid Marian, George Olson as Sir Guy, William Degan as Will Scarlet are among the members of the fine singing cast. Matinees are announced for Wednesday and Saturday.

Players Theatre.

Shakespeare's "Hamlet" was added to the repertory at the Players Theatre this week, and critics declare it to be even better than the production last year. The settings and lighting effects, which are new and along the lines of the advanced art in the theatre, do much to provide an atmosphere of tragic dignity. The cast includes, in addition to William S. Rainey as Hamlet, Boyd Oliver, Benjamin A. Purrington, William Hanley, James Fisk, Marie Louise Myers, Baldwin McGaw, Frederick Hirschler, Jane Parent, Virginia Sciaroni, Morris Ankrum, and others. "Hamlet" will be given again on Friday evening, October 29th, and Friday, November 5th.

Capacity houses have been greeting each presentation of Tolstoy's "Fedya," in which John Barrymore scored in New York under the title "Redemption." "Fedya" will hold the boards on Thursday evening, November 4th. "Ruddigore," Gilbert and Sullivan's burlesque, is the talk of the town and is undoubtedly the biggest hit the Players have had. A large cast, including Reginald Travers, Mabel Gump, Miriam Elkus, Benjamin Purrington, Easton Kent, Len Barnes, Ruth Bates, Jane Parent, Caroiyn Kroenke, and Emanuel Rosenthal, do full justice to the score. "Ruddigore" will be presented Saturday evening, October 30th; Wednesday, November 3d, and Saturday, November 6th.

The Alcazar Theatre.

The wit and humor of "Too Many Husbands" at the Alcazar this week will be followed by "The Argyle Case," to have first local stock production at next Sunday's matinee. And some extra thrills and surprises will be afforded by the reading of state and national returns on election night. In solving the mystery of who killed John Argyle the private detective, Asche Kayton, personated by Dudley Ayres, espouses the cause of Mary Masuret, the dead man's ward, who is among the many to fall under suspicion. Elwyn Harvey, who has scored so tremendously this week as a delightful comedienne, will be given widely contrasting emotional scope. The investigation of the murder mystery brings to light a big counterfeiting scheme, and both are worked out according to the methods of Detective William J. Burns, who collaborated with Harriet Ford and Harvey O'Higgins, authors of "The Dummy," in this exposition of underworld characters.

"The Cave Girl," to have first Pacific Coast performance Sunday, November 17th, is a comedy of the Maine woods and a real love story by George Middleton and Guy Bolton, authors of "Polly with a Past." It is the very latest of releases, having been produced at the Longacre, New York, by Comstock and Gest within the past six weeks.

The Maitland Playhouse.

"Justice," by John Galsworthy, will be the bill at the Maitland Playhouse for the week commencing next Monday evening with subscribers' night. The drama had a long run in New York and theatre-goers were enthusiastic over the performance that was given by Barrymore and his company.

It is the second Galsworthy play for this season at the Maitland, and Arthur Maitland has been at special pains in preparing for this production. Like all of the Galsworthy plays, it is a story to an end, but nevertheless it holds the interest and will doubtless be a magnet that draws the followers of the drama in San Francisco and the Bay region.

The men and women associated with Arthur Maitland this season in the theatre unusual on Stockton Street have met with much praise from the critics in their recent work and there is no question but that they have settled for a successful year of high-class performances.

Patrons of the Maitland are enjoying "The Faith-Healer," from the pen of William Vaughn Moody, which is being done this week and will be brought to a close with the Saturday matinee and Saturday night performances.

The Orpheum.

The sponsors of "Varieties of 1920," which tops the all new bill at the Orpheum next week, are said to have selected wisely and well. The production is described as being exquisite, but not obtrusive. Harry Carroll and Harry Richman wrote the lyrics. The latter is with the act. The cast is a large one. Aside from Richman, it includes Jack Waldron, Norma Hark, the Warde Sisters, and a troupe of Broadway beauties.

Emily Darrell will be remembered for her comedy sketches seen here formerly. Her present offering is "Late for Rehearsal." Her dress is exaggerated without being eccentric.

The comedy offering, "At the Seashore," of Hugh McCormick and Grace Wallace will surpass the expectation. The scene is a seashore hotel run by an old man who acts as life guard. One of the guests is Miss Wallace.

Satirists never will find a better medium of expression than the telephone, and a better satirist than George B. Hobard seldom is found among contemporaneous authors. "At the Phone," the satire which Lord Chester and Marven Morgan will present next week, is called one of the comedy hits of the season.

Glenn and Jenkins, wielders of the "porter's sceptre," in their "Working for the Railroad" will depict in song, dance, and dialogue the trials, tribulations, pleasures, distinctions, and arguments of a couple of colored men who have given their lives to the duties around a union depot.

Frank and Milt Britton will be found to be brilliant exponents of the popular variety of music. The xylophone is their instrument.

A wide assortment of head and hand balancing will be the offering of the Pierre De Kock Trio.

Joe Melvin will be seen in an exhibition of cleverness as the final act on the all new bill of Orpheum Circuit vaudeville.

Symphony Orchestra.

The next popular concert will be given by the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra in the Curran Theatre tomorrow afternoon. The principal numbers will be Halvorsen's "Vasantasena" suite, Debussy's "Children's Corner," and the well-known "William Tell" overture of Rossini. Other items to be included are the overture to Boieldieu's "La Dame Blanche," the intermezzo and barcarolle from Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffman," and Tschai-kowsky's brilliant "Italian Caprice."

Horace Britt will be the soloist at the next pair of regular symphony concerts, announced for Friday and Sunday afternoons, November 5th and 7th. He will play Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," a Hebrew rhapsody for cello and orchestra. Tschai-kowsky's Fifth will be the symphony offered, while the programme will open with Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture.

THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE RECENTLY ADOPTED A RESOLUTION RECOMMENDING THAT INITIATIVE NO. 1, ALIEN LAND LAW, BE REJECTED FOR THESE REASONS:

"FIRST: THE CLAUSE DENYING THE RIGHT TO LEASE AGRICULTURAL LANDS IS INEFFECTIVE IN OPERATION. IT MAY PROVE IRRITATING TO THE JAPANESE PEOPLE, BUT IT WILL NOT PREVENT THEM FROM OCCUPYING LANDS FOR AGRICULTURAL PURPOSES UNDER CROPPING CONTRACTS AND CONTRACTS FOR PERSONAL SERVICES, WHICH CAN NOT LEGALLY BE PROHIBITED TO ANY CLASS OF ALIENS.

"SECOND: THE INITIATIVE MEASURE CONTAINS UNNECESSARILY HARSH PROVISIONS CONCERNING THE GUARDIANSHIP OF THE CHILDREN OF RESIDENTS NOT ELIGIBLE TO CITIZENSHIP. * * *

"THIRD: THE REAL PROBLEM DISTURBING THE PEOPLE OF THIS STATE IS IN THE LAST ANALYSIS ONE OF IMMIGRATION. * * * STATE LEGISLATION CAN NOT DEAL WITH THIS ULTIMATE PROBLEM, AND HASTY OR INEFFECTIVE ACTION BY THE STATE THROUGH AN INITIATIVE MEASURE THAT IS AFTER ALL FUTILE, AND LIKELY TO STIR THE SPIRIT OF IRRITATION AND HOSTILITY, CAN IN OUR OPINION ONLY OPERATE AS AN EMBARRASSMENT AND MAY EVEN PROVE A HINDRANCE TO THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN THE ATTAINMENT OF A FINAL SOLUTION OF THE QUESTION OF IMMIGRATION."

ORGANIZED COMMERCE KNOWS THAT JAPAN BUYS FROM US ALMOST AS MUCH AS ALL OTHER ASIATIC COUNTRIES AND OCEANIA COMBINED. JAPANESE PURCHASES OF AMERICAN GOODS AMOUNT TO $4.50 PER CAPITA, WHILE CHINESE PURCHASES AMOUNT TO ONLY 10 CENTS PER CAPITA. THE FUTURE ECONOMIC PROGRESS OF OUR PACIFIC COAST IS MOST CLOSELY INTERWOVEN WITH OUR FRIENDSHIP WITH JAPAN.

ABOVE SUCH ECONOMIC CONSIDERATIONS IS THE QUESTION OF HONOR AND JUSTICE. THESE JAPANESE HAVE COME HERE AT OUR INVITATION AND ARE MAKING A LIVING IN OBSERVANCE OF OUR LAWS. ONLY IN CALLOUS INDIFFERENCE TO OUR TRADITION OF FAIR PLAY CAN WE ADOPT SUCH A LAW AS THIS INITIATIVE, MAKING IT VIRTUALLY IMPOSSIBLE FOR THESE JAPANESE TO PROVIDE FOR THE FUTURE OF THEIR CHILDREN.

THE ENLIGHTENED READERS OF THE ARGONAUT WILL NOT BE MISLED BY POLITICAL CATCH PHRASES OR THE HARANGUES OF AGITATORS, BUT WILL CAREFULLY WEIGH ALL THE ESSENTIAL FACTS ON THE QUESTION AND FORM THEIR OWN JUDGMENT BASED UPON REASON AND WISDOM. VANITY FAIR.

When the steamship Aquitania arrived in New York the other day she brought with her the largest diamond that has ever reached this country. It had been placed in charge of Mr. and Mrs. Fred Withram by Abu-el-Hafid, who was once the Sultan of Morocco. Mr. Withram is manager of the Madrid branch of the Mercantile Bank of America, and Mrs. Withram explained the confidence reposed in herself and her husband by citing the words of the ex-Sultan, who had ingeniously demarked, "You have good faces." The diamond, which is of a light straw color and a perfect stone, weighs 183.15 carats, is one and a half inches in diameter and one and a quarter inches deep. During the voyage the diamond was not placed in the purser's strong room, but was carried by Mrs. Withram in a leather bag. At night she placed the precious stone under her pillow. Incidentally we may note with some interest the confidence that a woman usually places in her pillow as a safe-deposit box. Personally we should think it left much to be desired.

Mrs. Withram obligingly gave some of the recent history of the diamond. It seems that Abu-el-Hafid used to wear it in the centre of his turban when he was Sultan of Morocco, but when he abdicated in favor of his brother he took the diamond with other jewels to Spain, as they were family heirlooms. With that delicacy of feeling that doubtless distinguishes the Sultan of Morocco he felt that as he no longer occupied a throne it was unnecessary for him to wear so gorgeous a diamond in his turban, and why should he keep a stone that he could not wear? The reasoning was faultless and the modesty gratifying. It only remained to decide where it could best be sold, and it was obviously proper that the choice should fall upon America, where all the millionaires make their homes and where a brisk competition among the newly-rich might be expected. The ex-Sultan has many other precious stones among the collection that he took with him from Morocco—doubtless family heirlooms—and among them some fine emeralds in square shape and very large, but these, he said, he would not part with.

Mr. Withram said he had no idea of the value of the diamond. He had taken it to the principal jewelers in London and Paris, but they were baffled. It was too big for valuation. The New York appraisers said the same thing. A big diamond was much in the same class as a picture. It was worth what any one could be persuaded to pay for it. In the ordinary way and if cut up into smaller stones it might be worth $50,000, but some collector might be willing to give half a million dollars for it.

We should like to know more about this diamond. We should like to be informed as to its early history, which we suspect to be a criminal one. Very few large diamonds are unknown to the police, so to speak. Usually they drip blood and voicelessly shriek of the crimes committed for their possession. We should also like to know something of the events immediately preceding its journey from Morocco to Spain. We have a profound respect for Abu-el-Hafid, and indeed for all Sultans. We like the title. It reminds us of the Arabian Nights, and just at present, when kings and emperors are a little unpopular, it is nice to think that there are still a few fruity old Sultans left on deck. Long may they wave. But we should like to know just why Abu "abdicated in favor of his brother." We want a "story," as a reporter would say. Did he abdicate willingly or was he persuaded? Was there any friction about it, or did Abu decide in an amicable way to let his brother have a turn at the hat. There is something suspiciously smooth about this yarn. Then, too, we should like to know why Abu took the jewels with him. Did his brother know about it—in advance, that is to say? We confess with shame to an almost complete ignorance as to the royal family of Morocco. Our newspapers are strangely lax in this respect. They should keep us informed. Does Abu ever visit Morocco since his departure with the family heirlooms? We have had little difficulties of our own in respect to family property, heirlooms and the like, although very few large diamonds or emeralds were involved, nor indeed anything that we should care to wear in our turban, and we know how these things go. It is true that there has been a little unpleasantness in Europe and it may have momentarily diverted our attention from Morocco, but we can only express the hope that there have been no family discords there and that no resentful Moroccan eyes have followed the course of the great diamond across the continent.

We have no intention of buying this diamond ourselves nor do we wish to say anything that might discourage any one else from doing so. But we much doubt if the buying of diamonds is quite so good an investment as it is supposed to be. The De Beers Company of South Africa have only to open their safes and the price of diamonds would fall to about one-half of what it is now.

"Piedmont Estates" Homesites

— IN —

The East Bay's Finest Residential Park

IN BEAUTIFUL PIEDMONT, commanding a most magnificent view of San Francisco Bay and the Marin County Hills.

THIS SUPERB residential Park is situated on the Sunkist slope of the Fashionable Piedmont District and is absolutely protected from disagreeable winds.

THIS PARK has been subdivided so the contours of the land give each homesite a natural setting. This will appeal to appreciative people, who desire something different from the ordinary flat level land without inspiration or artistic merit.

ONLY FIFTEEN of these remarkable homesites of from one to four acres; each one furnishing a most picturesque location for a home of dignity and refinement.

OVER ONE MILLION DOLLARS of Piedmont's finest homes adjacent to Piedmont Estates.

CAREFULLY RESTRICTED to home costing from $10,000 upward.

THIS UNIQUE LOCATION, the splendid plans prepared for the development of this beautiful residential Park, prepared by landscape Engineers of note, and the perfect building restrictions combine to make this a home place of distinctiveness and individuality.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

At the conclusion of the school term prizes were distributed. When one of the pupils returned home his mother chanced to be entertaining callers. "Well, Charlie," asked one of these, "did you get a prize?" "Not exactly," said Charlie, "but I got a horrible one."

The stranger approached the Washington policeman outside the Union Station and observed: "Say, I want to go to the White House." "Now, look here," the officer responded peevishly. "You're the ninth candidate that's come hithering me today, and it ain't a hit of use. I've always lived right here in the District of Columbia and haven't got a vote."

The constable of a New England village, a man of exceeding good nature, found it necessary to lock up three tramps who had strayed into his jurisdiction. Shortly after the arrest he was met by the mayor of the village, who, observing the constable hurrying down the main street, asked: "Where are you going, constable?" "Oh," explained the constable, "the three tramps I just locked up want to play bridge and I'm out hunting for a fourth."

Ting-ting-ting! The man who wanted food sat in the shabby little restaurant and rang the bell for the fifteenth time. He had been waiting nearly twenty minutes without even seeing a sign of any one in the place. Ting-ting-ting! As he rang for the sixteenth time a door at the back opened and a stout and untidy waiter waddled into the eating house. "Er—did you ring, sir?" he asked drowsily. "Oh, no!" replied the customer, sweetly. "I was only tolling the hall. I thought perhaps you were dead."

Two charming sisters are engaged to two brothers, and their neighbors have been greatly interested in this dual love affair. The young girls live in the second flat of a house on the south side of the street, and the other day the elder sister was stopped in the street by the young scion of the family who occupy the second flat in the house opposite. "Oh, Miss Miggs," said the boy, "my papa said last night that some one ought to tell you to pull down the blinds, 'cause if love is blind, the neighbors are not."

A man from a hone-dry Arkansas community went to a wet Missouri town and was invited by an acquaintance to have a drink. In the saloon the friend asked: "What are you going to have?" "Have?" dreamingly returned the visitor, hlinking at the glorious array of barreled and bottled goods. "I aint goin' to have nuthin'." "What do you mean, Gahe? You won't have a drink after coming all this distance?" "Nope!" answered the Arkansawyer. "There haint no such place as this. I'll wake up in a minute."

A man advertised his car for sale. Early the next morning a man who lived across the street came over and said: "Pardon me, but I see by last night's paper you advertised your car for sale." "Quite true," said the man who advertised the car, "but surely you are not in the market for it." "No," was the reply, "but I only live across the street and I also want to sell my car. And there would be no need of my spending my money for an advertisement if after the people were through looking at your car you could just send them across the street to look at my car."

The chief of police had been talking to some recruits about courage. He didn't try to impress his men that they must be superhuman or anything of that sort, but directed his talk along the lines of expediency and common sense. "Courage, after all, is only relative," he declared. "Very often we laugh at the fears of the small child over a harmless dog, yet we ourselves would think it perfectly natural to side-step a hull or an elephant. Little Billy, son of one of the sergeants on the force, summed up the situation pretty well after his mother had scolded him for being afraid to pass a big dog at the street corner. 'Well,' said Billy, 'you'd be afraid of him yourself if you were as lown down as I am.'"

The census-taker runs up against many amusing experiences. Chief among these are the explanations some people offer for the various answers they make to questions put to them. One of the census workers in Kansas City asked a woman whether she could read. She answered, rather hesitatingly, that she could not, and then hastened to explain: "I never went to school hut one day and that was in the evening, and we hadn't no light, and the teacher didn't come."

John Pollard, member of the Federal Trade Commission, was brought up in Virginia, where real live hears still roam the woods. In the same neighborhood with Pollard there once lived an old fellow whose wife made his life miserable. It was her custom to hounce skilletts, brickhats, pieces of stovepipe, and scantlings off the old man's head when she had nothing else to do. One day a neighbor rushed into the old man's yard and cried: "Jim, hurry down in the pasture; your wife is in a fight with a bear!" "Not on your life," Jim replied, pulling at the stem of his corn-cob pipe; "that bear got himself into that fight and he can get out the best way he can."

Strolling along the quiet side street without paying sufficient attention, Johnson slipped through an open coal hole in the pavement, and remained a prisoner there for nearly half an hour. Presently his face lighted up with hope as an elderly gentleman came sedately towards him. "Dear me!" exclaimed the newcomer, as he adjusted his glasses and stared at Johnson in wonder. "Have you fallen through the coal hole?" A murderous glare shone for a second in the victim's weary eyes; then he smiled sardonically. "You mistake, sir," he replied. "As you seem to be interested in the matter, I am ready to inform you as to exactly what has happened. I just chanced to be in here when the road was made, and they huilt the pavement round me."

THE MERRY MUSE.

Next?

It was enough of modern stuff
When Betsy bobbed her hair.
We thought it was just a bluff
At being debonair.

And when she wore a jaunty skirt
That barely reached her knee,
We said it really did not hurt,
And left her ankles free.

She puffed a pretty cigarette—
We raised our brows and eyes,
And said that by and by we'd get Accustomed to surprise.

She slipped into a hackless dress—
She slipped, perchance, is right!
We registered regret, I guess,
At such a harehacked sight.

She's going now from had to worse—
We fear to die from shocks—
We dare not add another verse
Since Betsy took to socks!
—Mabel Haughton Collyer in Judge.

Ballade of the Youth That Lasts.

Youth goes, we say, because, forsooth,
Our thirtieth year is long gone by;
There is no calendar for youth,
Be young with me, and so will I—
'Tis but an antiquated lie
That counts life over with and done,
Ere scarce its morning dews are dry;
At forty youth is just begun.

O hot of heart and sweet of tooth,
Blindly afoot, he knows not why,
His aimless aim the lad pursueth,
And leaves his fair plucked flowers to die:
The man, with no less rapt an eye
Wins, but wastes not the thing he won,
Reaps where he sows—but babes deny
At forty youth is just begun.

The bitter and the lovely truth,
The joys that last, the joys that fly,
The wise and foolish things he doeth,
The years have taught him to desery;
Yet still his cup is lifted high,
With brimming splendors overrun,
Death and the Devil to defy—
At forty youth is just begun.

ENVOI.

Away, Prince, with that shallow sigh
Of vanished youth! the noonday sun
Is ours, and all the summer sky—
At forty youth is just begun.
—Richard Le Gallienne in Judge.

Jerusalem's Surroundings.

The view of Jerusalem as one leaves the Garden of Gethsemane draws the heart with sympathy (writes William D. McCracken in Asia). The walls rise severely above bare slopes where nothing grows, for it is outside the city proper that biblical prophecies of the desolation of Jerusalem seem to be fulfilled.

Today the city stands midway between the horrors of the Turkish régime and the promised good of the British mandatory rule.

Nothing has been done as yet in a public way to beautify the city. North and west the houses straggle outside the walls; on the south forbidding slopes border the road to Bethlehem; and on the east lies the terrible valley of Jehoshaphat—a valley of dry bones.

Seventeen times destroyed—hitterly hated— anxiously sought—how desperate a history since Nehuchadnezzar captured it more than twenty-five centuries ago.

Redeemed today, hut in her nakedness, Jerusalem waits to be clothed. She has as yet no grace, no covering for her ugly wounds. Some day her sides will glisten with the brightness of a heavenly radiance; she will be washed and anointed like a bride waiting for the bridegroom.

"The Smiths used to have a splendid cook." "Yes, hut she and Mrs. Smith could not get along." "Dear me! So I suppose Smith had to discharge her?" "Oh, no; he divorced his wife."—Detroit Gateway.

20th ANNIVERSARY

KNIT GOODS SALE

TWENTY YEARS—two short decades—but in that brief time an obscure and humble workshop grew into a mighty knitting plant. In 1900 a small, local affair; in 1920 a manufacturing enterprise of more than national prestige.

SUCCESS crowned our efforts, because we remained true to our ideals—to give utmost values in distinctive, original productions. We succeeded, because of expert knowledge and sincerity of purpose to produce only the dependable in Knit Goods.

Now this ANNIVERSARY SALE to please our old, as well as to make many new patrons

Hallowe'en Dinner and Dance.

Years ago merry England instituted the happy custom of observing Hallowe'en, when ghosts are privileged to revisit the scenes of their past life. From this humble beginning Hallowe'en has grown to be the inspiration for many a jolly entertainment. This season it is the motif of the Hallowe'en dinner and dance which Hotel Whitcomb is giving on Saturday evening, October 30th. The dinner menu for this occasion includes all the favorite dishes associated with Hallowe'en festivities. For the Hallowe'en dance afterwards in the picturesque Sun Lounge a delightful programme of music has been arranged by Orchestra Director Hayward, who has chosen lively dancing melodies and to them added many Hallowe'en thrills.

David Belasco's production of the powerful drama, "Tiger Rose," comes to the Columbia Theatre following "Robin Hood."

Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Lilienthal, Jr., are being congratulated on the birth of a son.

The theory that youth may be renewed by inserting animal glands into the human body has degenerated into a matter of heated debate between German and French scientists.

A CULTURED WOMAN, English University graduate, seeks re-engagement; formerly hostess and private secretary to a late U. S. diplomat (widower) 6 years; also for two years manager of a gentleman's household and superintendent of estate, charge of all orders and accounts. Traveled all over the world. Locality immaterial. Highest personal references. Would take temporary a daily position. Box B, The Argonaut, 207 Powell Street.

WANTED by woman of culture and refinement, position as chaperon, social secretary or companion. Experienced traveler. Familiar with Eastern cities. References. Phone Market 9356.

Tea Tales

"Aunt Theo, I'm going to a Hallowe'en Dinner and Dance here at Hotel Whitcomb next Saturday evening."

"You are?"

"Yes, Capt. Harwin has asked me."

"Isn't that fine. You'll have a good time."

"I surely will. Hotel Whitcomb has arranged a Special Hallowe'en Dinner—all odd, Hallowe'en kinds of food."

"And then the dancing after dinner, too. Capt. Harwin is a wonderful dancer, and the music will have all sorts of Hallowe'en thrills in it."

"Why don't you strike Easycoin for a loan?" suggested Slopay. "I did," sighed Hardup. "But he told me that I had struck him centsless."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

"And now, gentlemen," piped the orator, "I just wish to tax your memory." "Good heavens!" exclaimed one of the audience, "has it come to that?"—London Tit-Bits.

"We must let bygones be bygones." "I endeavor to do so. I no longer give a thought to the time I wasted making up my mind how I would vote in the primaries."—Washington Star.

"The screen shows bathing girls on the beach, in the parlor, in restaurants and on the street." "Yes, I've seen them everywhere except in the water."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"Bill talks too much about himself." "He claims that that is the way to make other people talk about you." "Yes, but they won't say the same things that you do."—Boston Transcript.

"Your political rival is getting the reputation of using better English than you do." "I know it," replied Senator Sorghum. "He has a better stenographer than I have."—Washington Star.

"You waste too much paper," said the editor. "But how can I economize?" "By writing on both sides." "But you won't accept stories written on both sides of the sheet." "I know, but you'd save paper just the same."—Boston Transcript.

"Did you tell your boss you had a sick grandmother or anything, so you could get off for the ball game?" "Didn't have to tell him anything. His boss and his boss' boss were hush looking for excuses of their own to get out and play golf."—Washington Star.

Mrs. Bacon—And have your husband's table manners improved? Mrs. Egbert—Oh, I think so. Mrs. Bacon—And can he manage spaghetti all right now? Mrs. Egbert—Oh, well, you see, when he began to try and improve his table manners we thought it just as well to give up having spaghetti.—Yonkers Statesman.

Mr. Myles—I understand your wife cried in church last Sunday. Mr. Styles—Yes, she did. Mr. Myles—Was the sermon so affecting? Mr. Styles—It wasn't that, but a woman she doesn't like sat right in front of her and she had on a hat exactly like my wife's.—Yonkers Statesman.

Mrs. Gotham—Are you going to take the children out today, Henry? Mr. Gotham—No, dear, I'm not; I'm going hunting. Mrs. Gotham—Well, can't you take them hunting with you? Mr. Gotham—No; I'm afraid. Mrs. Gotham—Afraid of what? Mr. Gotham—Afraid I won't get what I'm going after if I take them. I'm going flat hunting.—Yonkers Statesman.

"Bessie," said her mother, "why is it that you and your small brother are always quarreling?" "I don't know," returned the child "unless I take after you and he takes after papa."—Boston Transcript.

"Dr. Pillers seems to be a fashionable physician." "I should say so! He has patients at the some of the most expensive health resorts in America and a waiting list of people whose health will give way as soon as they get money enough to consult him."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

With a Grain of Salt.

Secretary Colby allowed it to be understood a couple of weeks ago that Bolshevism in Russia was about to collapse, and our always credulous newspapers at once broke out into the usual hallelujahs. It was true that they had been told the same things over and over again, and the news had always proved to be false.

Now comes a bulletin announcing the defeat by the Bolshevik forces of General Wrangel's army in southern Russia. If Bolshevism is dead it seems to be a surprisingly lively and vigorous corpse. Already we hear rumors that the French are about to send General Wiegand to do for General Wrangel what he did for the Poles and we are told comfortingly that Allied warships can be counted on to guard the rear of Wrangel's army.

Now it may be true that the Bolshevik government is about to collapse. It will certainly collapse at some time and then the latest prediction to that effect will have come true. But we strongly suspect that Secretary Colby did not know anything at all about the matter and that the report in question was promulgated for its possible effect upon the election. Drowning men catch at straws, and it might be counted as a feather in the Administration cap if the dawn of a brighter day in Russia should seem to justify the Administration policies. As a matter of fact there have been no Administration policies with regard to Russia, nothing but a series of "happy thoughts," reckless experiments, and an alternate opening of the hot and cold water faucets. In the meantime we may take all stories of a Bolshevik collapse with a grain of salt. They may be true—but General Wrangel has been defeated all the same.

Te Deum.

The thing that was certain has happened, but it has happened so tremendously as to surprise even those who expected it and hoped for it. Writing early on Wednesday morning, and from incomplete and unclassified returns, the Republican victory presents itself as a sort of dazzling aurora. It is difficult, almost impossible, to select the detailed significances from the tangle of good news that comes from every part of the country. But we know enough. Today there is only one political party in the United States, and it is the Republican party. The counting of the last vote will not change that fact. The Republican majority in the House can not fall much short of seventy, and probably there will be a Republican majority of twelve or fourteen in the Senate. The new President will have the ball at his feet. He will have a House and a Senate ready to coöperate with him, and he will avail himself of that readiness in the way intended by the Constitution and sanctioned by usage. If we have descended into an administrative and legislative hell during the last few years we shall all the more appreciate a return to a practical sobriety of government in which there will be no czarism, no autocracy, no impudence of officialism, and no squalid orgies of thieving extravagance. Let us hope that we have learned all the lessons, and for all time, that our deviation into a ruinous hysteria can teach.

The effort to analyze the mind of the electorate can easily be overdone. There are large numbers of voters who do not think with precision, but who are none the less capable of accurate judgments on the situation as a whole. The overwhelming popular vote that has been registered is not distinctively a vote against the league of nations, nor against autocracy, nor against extravagance, nor against Bolshevism in high places. It is a vote against all of these things and a dozen others, as contained and expressed in the monstrous thing to which we have learned to give the name of Wilsonism. It is Wilsonism that has just been condemned and so ruinously overthrown. It is Wilsonism in its score of manifestations that we have come to look upon as something so politically evil as to be a threat, not only against the integrity of the nation, but against the peace of the world. It has taken us a long time to throw off the mesmerism of unmeaning and unmeant phrases, of promises unfulfilled, of words intended to conceal intentions and not to reveal them, of ferret subterfuges, of devious and stealthy deeds. The electorate at large knows now that it has been deceived, that nothing has been as it pretended to be, as it was said to be, as it ought to be, that pacifism has covered many a hateful thing, and that a lofty proletarianism has been so used as to stimulate the most frightful forms of anarchy. There are large parts of the electorate that look at these things collectively, in mass, so to speak. They have been conscious of a resentful discontent and they have voted accordingly. That is precisely as it should be.

The average man is touched most sensitively in his pocket. Perhaps it ought not to be so, but it is. But he is generous withal, although in a strictly business-like way. We were prepared to spend money to win the war and to do anything whatever in the way of reconstruction that ought to be done. If the sum had been twice as large it would have been forthcoming without a murmur. But we were not tolerant of the wasting of such incredible sums, and we have yet to learn where we must draw the line between wasting and something worse. Hog Island cost us some seventy million dollars, and what did we receive in return? We paid a thousand million dollars for aircraft and received hardly the fluttering of a wing in exchange. Other hundreds of millions were similarly squandered and there was nothing to show for it except the struttings and mouthings of the Wilsonian puppets, pious axioms, lying official reports. The money was drawn forth by taxes that the people could not afford to pay, and still we are being racked by imposts that paralyze industry and that are directed against the sources of revenue. If these prodigious sums of money had been usefully employed there would have been no protest. But they were not usefully employed. They were wasted. There were no corresponding results.

The fear of Bolshevism certainly played its part in the débâcle of Wilsonism. The electorate can hardly be blamed for its tardiness in recognizing the mischief that was going on. It seemed incredible; indeed it was incredible until the evidences became unanswerable. Some Eastern newspapers have already spoken of the "parlor" Bolshevism that contributed to the Republican victory. Unfortunately the Wilsonian Bolshevism was by no means confined to the parlor. It became official. When the President sent the flaming brand through Europe, when he maddened the immature nations of Europe by visions of impossible Utopias, when he addressed himself to peoples over the heads of their governments, we were willing to attribute such vagaries to the exuberances of enthusiasm. But we were to be undeceived when we found that reckless and violent men were carefully selected for the most delicate missions, and that even the most unconcealed treason seemed to be a passport instead of a bar to official favor. We were still further undeceived when we found that the official life of the country was being saturated with the poison of dangerous radicalism, and that all our ancient political and social values seemed to be reversed. Even now we have no full realization of this mischief and of the insidious processes that have been at work in our midst. And perhaps it is only the historian who will be able to tell us what Wilsonism has done in Europe in the awakening of economic and industrial passions, in the fanning of revolutions, in the encouragement of anarchy. That the President acted with good intentions is no palliation. Good intentions unguided by knowledge lie at the root of our gravest ills.

The vote of the women seems to have been mainly Republican, although here, of course, we are in the domain of speculation. But it is probable that women, more idealistic than men, felt more severely than men the failure of the peace league and the exposure of a pacifism that appealed chiefly to the emotions. The political education of women has proceeded apace. We may even believe that they have studied the distinctive problems of the day with a greater intellectual zest than have men. Generally speaking, they have more leisure as they certainly have a newer enthusiasm. There has also come to them a sense of responsibility with added powers, and perhaps it may be said without contradiction that the ethical instinct is more emergent in women than in men. And the questions of today are peculiarly ethical questions—peace and war, an immoral radicalism, the miseries of Europe. However that may be it is now evident that there was no cause for uneasiness in the vast influx of women voters. They have not voted emotionally nor sentimentally, but—like the rest of us—in the light of facts and conditions, and perhaps somewhat more ethically than the rest of us. At least we should like to believe it so.

But the supreme fact remains that Wilsonism has been banished. The work of disinfection may take some time, but it will be done. We need have no doubt about that. We have wandered sufficiently long in the wilderness of autocracy, illegality, and executive arrogance and we are now about to return to the domain of order, impersonality, and constitutionalism. It may be a long climb out of the ditch, but the first step has been taken. And for this Te Deum Laudamus.

The New Cabinet.

The President-elect is probably busy selecting his cabinet, or at least surveying the possibilities. He has plenty of material from which to choose and we may be quite sure that his favor will not be given to non-entities simply because they are correctly branded with some particular political piety. Nor will any man be allowed to climb into prominence by the simple expedient of writing something full of slandering flatteries. The little tadpoles have had their day. In a few months they will return to the oblivion from which they ought never to have emerged, and the places that knew them once will know them no more forever.

There is at least one obligation from which the new President will be free. He will be under no obligations to Mr. Gompers. There will be no bill from the American Federation of Labor for services rendered. Organized labor, so far as it was articulate, did its best to beat Senator Harding, and it made no secret of its hostility. One wonders why Mr. Gompers, usually so astute, should make such a mistake as this. Surely he could have seen the handwriting on the wall from the very beginning, but that he was unaccountably blind in this respect relieves Senator Harding of what otherwise might be an embarrassment. None the less we may be sure that he will make a good choice for Secretary of Labor, and one that will be in no way dictated by resentment or hostility. He has a wide field from which to choose, but not even his closest advisers know the direction of his mind in this respect.

There is a general belief in Washington that Senator Sutherland of Utah will find a place in the cabinet. Senator Sutherland has been constantly at Marion since the opening of the front-porch campaign. He is known as one of the ablest constitutional lawyers in the country and also as being particularly well informed on international relations, and this has given rise to the rumor that he may be Secretary of State. It seems rather more likely that he will be offered the post of Attorney-General and that the portfolio of Secretary of State will go either to Dr. David Jayne Hill, who has not only distinguished himself by his discussions of foreign affairs, but who is known to have been the mentor, so to speak, of Senator Harding himself, or to Mr. Root. It need not be said that Mr. Root is facile princeps in foreign affairs, but it is by no means certain that he would be willing to assume such large responsibilities.

There is a general expectation that Mr. Hoover will join the cabinet, and certainly there could be few appointments more popular than this. It is almost safe to say that it will depend upon Mr. Hoover himself, and Mr. Hoover is among the least ambitious of men so far as political preferment goes. If he should be acquiescent in this respect he would obviously be more at home in the Department of the Interior than anywhere else. An engineer is particularly called for here, as the department contains the Bureau of Mines, the Geological Survey, the General Land Office, the Reclamation Service, and the Alaska Railroad. In no other department of the government is there need for so much engineering capacity. Mr. Gifford Pinchot, by the way, has been trying to edge into Senator Harding's counsels, but he has not been exactly welcomed. Senator Harding is now very well informed as to the mischief that has been done to the West by "conservation" of the Pinchot variety and he is not likely to turn a willing ear in Mr. Pinchot's direction.

But all forecasts of cabinet appointments are speculative, although in some respects the indications are strong. But of one thing we may be certain. The cabinet will consist of the best men available, men noted for their common sense, and not for their eccentricities, and there could be no more complete change than that. The new President has to establish a party government, although not a partisan government, and his great task is to create a cabinet that will help to bring the legislative and the executive departments into harmony. To succeed he must have a coördination of effort. The problem of dealing with the House is a much more complicated one than that of dealing with the Senate. Too many members of the House have found it politically profitable to refuse to follow their party leaders. The President's task is to establish and carry through a complete programme, and it is one of extreme difficulty and delicacy. Between now and March 4th that programme must at least be outlined, and this means a vast amount of tactful work and a loyal, cohesive, and intelligent cabinet.

The New President and Peace.

The election to the presidency of Senator Harding does not mean that there will be no league of nations. Quite the contrary. Nor does it mean that America enters upon a period of selfish isolation, intent upon her own internal problems and indifferent to the results of a war in which she played so large a part. She could not do this, however much she might wish it, and she does not wish it.

America is now in a state of war with Germany. President Wilson, who "kept us out of war," has also "kept us out of peace" by his insistence on an international agreement repugnant to the good sense of the people. First he delayed the formation of the general treaty and so contributed immeasurably to the prevailing anarchy in Europe. Then he vitiated the treaty by the inclusion of a league of nations of a highly contentious nature and wholly irrelevant to the immediate issue, which was the establishment of peace. As a result we are still nominally at war with Germany, and we must probably wait for a declaration of peace until the advent of the new administration. And then will come the question of a league of nations under auspices that will guarantee its success.

We are now gradually getting the dust out of our eyes. We made a vast mistake when we supposed that Europe was enamored with the league and chagrined because she could not use America for the furtherance of her territorial ambitions. Europe, so far as the great powers are concerned, is wholly indifferent to the league and always has been. When President Wilson visited America during the course of the conference the league was instantly hustled away into a drawer and the business of the treaty proceeded with. His absence was the opportunity of the peacemakers and his presence was their despair. The old paralysis set in the moment he returned. The league was resurrected and the prospects of a speedy peace faded away. These are matters of record. Even Colonel House has repudiated responsibility for the delays caused by the league. The tyrant fiddled while Rome burned, and as a consequence Rome is still burning.

Dr. David Jayne Hill, writing in the North American Review for October, epitomizes the Wilsonian veto upon peace in the following words. He says: "When, on March 14th, Mr. Wilson returned to Paris from the United States, he discovered that a resolution proposed by Mr. Balfour had been adopted in his absence—inspired perhaps by the caution which the Senate's protest had suggested—providing for an immediate preliminary treaty of peace with Germany containing all the essential settlements, but omitting entirely the league of nations. Insisting that the resolution adopted January 25th, which included the covenant of the league as a part of the treaty, should be controlling, Mr. Wilson insisted that the preliminary peace plan should be abandoned. As a friend and apologist of the President has said, 'It overturned the most important action of the conference during the President's absence.'" Obviously it was not Europe that clamored for the league. Europe wanted a quick peace irrespective of the league. It was Mr. Wilson who vetoed the peace and who has kept us at war until the present moment.

France in particular was openly contemptuous of the league. Lloyd George begged the House of Commons not to laugh when the league was mentioned. Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler tells us that Europe approved the league because she believed that she would thereby please America, and for no other reason. If any of us feel a reluctance to "break the heart of the world" by rejecting the present league we may make our minds easy upon that point. The heart of the world is far more likely to thank God for a good riddance.

It is easy to foresee what will happen under the guidance of President Harding. He will not be likely to lose so unmatched an opportunity to place America in the moral leadership of the world. He will undoubtedly summon or approve some sort of an international conference composed, not of millennialists, but of practical men prepared to meet a practical situation in a practical way. Probably the immediate aim of such a conference will be the codification of international law and the establishment of some sort of court of international justice with an extension and reaffirmation of the principle of arbitration as expressed in the many existing treaties. There need be no threats of violence in such an agreement. It need not bristle with bayonets nor smell of poison gas as does the league of nations. There need be no appeal whatsoever to force. The Supreme Court of the United States executes justice between the states without any provisions for enforcement, and it has invariably been obeyed. There is no nation on earth that would dare defy the judgment of a properly constituted international court, even though it had not the backing of a policeman. It is the imponderables that count, as Bismarck once said. Nothing is more remarkable than the chatter about peace that comes from the advocates of a league of nations that marshals the world's armies and navies with the insouciance of a child playing with its tin soldiers, and that throws the deadly boomerang of the boycott as the theologian once threw his harmless anathemas. The election of Senator Harding does not mean the recession into the background of our hopes of international peace agreements. On the contrary it means their emergence into the light.

Poor Little Rich Children.

Mrs. Ira Couch Wood of the American Dietetic Association is the latest to utter the absurdity that "the government spends millions annually upon domestic animals and the preventing of disease among them and spends thousands only upon the children." Mrs. Wood should ascertain the amounts spent annually upon education and raised by taxation for that purpose. She might then avoid such grotesque inaccuracies as this.

Mrs. Wood presumably means that the government does not yet supervise the feeding of children, the brushing of their teeth, the removal of their adenoids, the administration of dill water and peppermint, the imparting of sex hygiene, and the inculcation of the correct brand of morals. The government, in other words, is still under the conviction that most children have mothers and fathers, not to speak of the usual allowance of maiden aunts, and that it is not the proper function of the government to regulate the nursery, the kitchen, or the domestic medicine chest.

It may be said that to some extent the government ought to concern itself with the well-being of children who are the victims of extreme poverty or illiteracy. True enough, but Mrs. Wood herself shows that it is not these children that are the chief sufferers. The children of the rich, she says, are from 12 to 20 per cent. underweight. In Chicago a group of foreign children near the stockyards were only 17 per cent. underweight, while in an all-American group near the University of Chicago they were 57 per cent. below normal. Evidently this can not be due to ignorance, at least not to any preventable ignorance. And so we wonder what Mrs. Wood would have us do—start a governmental department at the public expense for the care of the poor little rich child?

Editorial Notes.

The incubus of the Sinn Fein seems to be a permanent and a progressive American institution. A Washington dispatch to the New York Times tells us that the White House has been picketed by Sinn Fein little girls carrying placards with inscriptions insulting to the President of the United States. A banner carried by a little girl in white bore the words "Lloyd George the anarchist and Wilson his junior partner." One would suppose that these children would be at once removed and suitably disciplined. But not at all. The authorities, we are told, are "taking the matter under consideration," and this presumably means that they are estimating the number of votes involved. But suppose these children had been Filipinos, or Haitians, or Poles? But that is a foolish question that answers itself.

British Columbia has tried prohibition and has had enough of it. A referendum vote shows a large majority in favor of repeal and a new experiment which will place the sale of intoxicants in the hands of the government. The reasons for this striking change of front are not stated, but they may easily be guessed. The same reasons exist here. We may suppose that there was a carnival of law-breaking, law evasion, bribery, corruption, and general iniquity, and that drink and drugs became the horrid topics of the day just as they are here. We may even venture on the prediction that a further era of futile tinkering will end in a like manner. But in Canada they seem to have some way of ascertaining the popular will on such matters as prohibition. We should adopt it.

An American Socialist who has just returned from Russia and who writes in the New York Volkzeitung confirms the report that Emma Goldman is much dissatisfied with her Russian friends and would like to return to America. She was adulated in America, but in Russia she finds herself at the tail end of the procession. She was used to luxury in America, but in Russia she has to share in the general privation. As a result she has become a sort of conservative or reactionary, and was even watched with suspicion by her little Bolshevik friends. Emma Goldman never had any real sympathy for the people, or at best it was the kind of sympathy that avoids close contact and holds itself aloof. Her chief characteristic was pugnacity, and it seems to be still in evidence.

Miss Pankhurst of unsavory notoriety seems to be once more in trouble in London. She is accused of a treasonable correspondence with Lenine, who is anxious to provoke a revolution in England and anxious that Miss Pankhurst should help him to do so. But the lady is a little shy. She tells Lenine that the time is not yet ripe, and then she points out that if she should find herself in prison there is a reasonable possibility that she would have to stay there, seeing that the authorities are no longer susceptible to the plea of the hunger striker. This suggestive confession on the part of Miss Pankhurst is recommended to the attention, prayerful or otherwise, of those emotional persons who hold that Mayor MacSwiney should have been liberated because he refused to eat. If he had been liberated we may suppose that Miss Pankhurst would then have felt it safe to lay her Bolshevik cards on the table and to proceed with her revolution in the full assurance that nothing worse could happen to her than the loss of a few meals.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

The Religious View.

VANCOUVER, B. C., October 27, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: It has given me much pleasure to read the excellent articles published in the Argonaut on this matter, and I trust you will be pleased to allow me to attack this iniquity (for such it is) more directly from the religious side. Prohibition has been nursed in the self-righteousness of the churches, and if we are to believe the Bible as a sure guide to all truth (as I do) the churchman, if a prohibitionist, has a very bad case indeed. The argument is never fully put forward as I now do, for want of courage perhaps, for fear of combining the sacred name with the saloon and drunkard. Excepting these, I myself have no fear in defending that which legitimately used is approved of, not condemned, in the Scriptures. Moses, who received the law of God directly, gave permission for the use of strong drink, and that law is said to be holy, just, and good; and our great exemplar, who made wine in Cana of Galilee with his apostle, Paul, also confirmed and advised its temperate use. No sophistry can erase these facts. We are told that under Moses' law they who despised the law received no mercy, and they who despise the Savior's example stand also condemned. It follows from the above the prohibitionist is guilty and that the following charges against him are substantiated: The despising of Moses' permission, the act of Cana in Galilee, and of Paul, who writes that his teachings are the commandments of God. The arrogance in supposing a greater righteousness than that of the Creator. The attack on personal liberty God given. The assumption that medical theory (we have much to learn) is sounder than the biblical teaching of moderation. The practical accusation that Christ made something poisonous for the enjoyment of his fellow-creatures. (There is no getting away from the text, and from that text a sincere Christian must believe that the making of that wine blessed it for all time.) The setting of man's wisdom against that of the Creator, conceiving an immediate reformation which is attainable only by time and education with control. The calling of that unclean which God made. (Call not thou that common or unclean.)

If the prohibitionist (Christian) can reconcile his conscience with the above he must be a hard-haked Baptist or Methodist indeed. So from a purely Christian standpoint I have no hesitation in saying that prohibition will fail. God must be justified, and the reaction may be terrible. But as a Christian I can not be a prohibitionist, and if I may be permitted to say so, I fear my Creator, knowing Him to be all-wise. There is no argument, however plausible, that gives one section of mankind authority to dominate another; not one sufficiently just to force the world hone-dry. Saul, King of Israel, in his day was a prohibitionist. He nearly lost his son Jonathan. Temptation will come, wet or dry. Let the prohibitionist be careful. He may also nearly lose his son. Tyranny and oppression have their own reward. God will be justified.

Yours faithfully,

E. COATSWORTH.

Prohibition.

BOSTON, October 29, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Referring to your recent article criticizing the "ruling" permitting the manufacture of wine for family consumption, "crude politics" or not it is at least a step in the right direction, and I trust your Italian friends will give the credit to whom it is due. I, for one, am thoroughly disgusted with the present rulers of the Republican party, and at the coming election shall vote a straight Democratic ticket for the first time. For several reasons I fail to see how any self-respecting person can vote for Harding; his record on prohibition alone is sufficient reason to punish him politically. I can not see but that a vote for Harding and Coolidge is an endorsement of prohibition. I do not know which party is responsible for California ratifying the Eighteenth Amendment, but I do know that my state (Massachusetts) ratified the amendment through the efforts of its Republican representatives (so called), who were largely in the majority. The Democrats in Massachusetts were strongly opposed to the amendment. I also know that the Republicans of New York, Maine, and New Hampshire were responsible for the ratification in those states. I think you will admit that the Republican party—if not guilty of bringing prohibition about—is absolutely responsible for not preventing it; also that there never has been a more disgraceful piece of legislation. And as for the contemptible Volstead Act, I am unable to forget that a Republican Congress passed it over President Wilson's veto. And I am also unable to forget that this same Republican Congress refused to lift the ban of "war-time" prohibition. I am told on good authority that "political and party reasons" is the excuse for these disgraceful actions, and if this is true it is a fine compliment to the intelligence of the nation, to say the least. Put the entire country in jeopardy—anything at all, just to give the Democratic administration a "black eye." Well, it has not made a hit with me. I am in favor of a new Republican party, and have an idea that four more years of punishment will bring this about. We have been sheep in the past, but I hope the day of awakening has come.

Yours very truly,
J. B. RICHARDSON.

THE MADNESS OF MAN.

The world is a more or less simpering Bedlam broken loose, and America is possibly, after Russia, the most irresponsible lunatic at large. And here let us say quickly and before the patriotic thunders break upon our head that this denunciation comes from the pen of Alice Brown, whose article, "The Madness of Man," appears in the current issue of the North American Review and is easily the gem of that most estimable periodical.

America, says Alice Brown, has apparently decided that there has been no war and that nothing has occurred to ruffle the placid course of human events. America is holding a small figure of Peace close to her eyes, Peace with an olive branch and a dove. Nothing else is visible to her myopic gaze. Those who manage for us our literature and our drama have issued the edict that the biggest drama the world has seen since the Crucifixion must now be ignored. We have persuaded ourselves that all earthly ills may be banished by the simple expedient of not looking at them. No one is being killed at this moment by Teuton devilry, and therefore no one ever again will be killed. An extension of the process enables us to believe that no one ever has been killed. W. J. Locke says somewhere that the literary artist must now proceed on "the amazing postulate that there has been no war." This, of course, makes us very charitable, in a befuddled sort of way, to those whom we mistakenly believe to have troubled the peace of the world. Says Alice Brown:

Because Germany can not pay her debts on the nail, we find warrant, as touching forgiveness of trespasses, in Holy Writ, and question whether she need, in the most absolute sense, pay at all. It is, we opine, a wrong to children not yet born to saddle them with colossal obligations incurred by their forebears, and we show no tendency to illuminate that implacable index finger, again of Holy Writ, pointing out the stony way of the "third and fourth generation of them" that live under the gospel of hate. Now indisputably the children of Germany may well be rickety children, and that any children of any race should suffer lack, is an offense so monstrous that sacred childhood itself might well be conceived of as rising up with accusing might in that court where "their angels do always behold the face" of the Father. They may reasonably have been crippled by the political crimes of their progenitors. But there are other children in the wide areas Germany and Austria trampled into wastes comparable only to unimagined circles of hell. Grave witnesses have seen to it that we have abundant evidence. They have shown us pictures of the enfeebled children of France, Belgium, and the East, typical victims out of those multitudes whom Germany and her fellow-raiders went far toward bleeding white—little weakened men and women old in grief. Our present lax benevolence to Germany is not paid for out of our own pockets. It is paid for by the shattered future of the races she despoiled—victims not only of the Hun, but of our crooked logic in a world policy haphazard and confused.

Not even Bolshevism can shake our complacency. For does not Bolshevism talk of liberty and freedom and have not we, too, talked of liberty and freedom? What, then, can be so terribly wrong with Bolshevism? Moreover, are we not sleeping soundly in our beds at night, and would that be possible if there were anything wrong with the world? Certainly not. Therefore there is nothing wrong with the world. What can be plainer?

Is it possible that we are sincere in our equanimity? Are we actually ignorant that the world is still aflame? Do we think the act of our getting out the engines at the last did quench the fire for all time within a long perspective, and we, at least, are safe? I believe as a nation we do. The land is "made glorious sumner by this sun," of a sophistical prosperity. We are not only at ease, but we swagger under the assumption that the war is conclusively won, and by us. It is true that, in one sense, we did win it, that, so desperate was the moment, the impact of our tardy chivalry was enough to shiver the shield of German arrogance. But in no other sense did we win it, and this despite the valor of our men and women, the concerted force of their brave rallying. We were the spectator who watches the drowning man and his rescuer hantling toward the shore and who, when they are both on the point of going down exhausted, steps in, his own breath and muscle at their maximum, and saves them. The dramatic deed is his, its hazard and reward, but the man who unhesitatingly plunged, who hung on, against hope, against belief, his is the nunc plaudite of the all-seeing gods. We are told by the easy-going that these things are no more to be remembered, and that to rehearse them is ungenerous. We are given specious reasons why it was, in some never comprehensible way, wiser to lull the nation with weasel words while the world was dying. And it is true that in the simplest and most terrific indictment of human accountability ever written, "what's done is done." Only, being done, the bloody deed of our Great Refusal cries aloud from the ground, warning us to walk softly and swear by all the pains and penalties incurred by recreant honor, never to shirk responsibility again. But we are by no means walking softly. We are misreading along the highway of a specious prosperity. No misereere Domine for us, or, if it sparsely rise, it is overborne by the strangled guttural of the multitudinous motor-car, going, it knows not quite where, hut, according to trenchant slang, perennially "on the way." The breath of prayer is husky in our throats, choked by the stench of gasoline, drowned out in jazz. We have forgotten that the world is in anguish. We still in effect believe this is "no concern of ours." Was ever more crooked thinking hent out of the straight lines of eternal laws?

There was a time when we seemed to be on the mount of transfiguration, when the breath of a great moral wind seemed to blow away the vapors of our greeds and our materialisms. We saw France and Flanders as great, martyred figures against the background of blazing war. For a moment we saw the ideal and were ready to act ideally. And then came the hardening of the heart under the deadening spell of prosperity, or at least so it seemed. The author asks if we were really so far below the rank and file of other nations. She does not believe it. It was our brains that failed to function. We could not realize that the world was in flames and that we, too, were parts of that world. But when the realization did come we drove our "laggard leadership into war."

But now once more we have fallen asleep and are dreaming dreams that either represent no realities or that are base dreams. It would not be strange, says the author, if our democracy had become a byword and a hissing. Indeed it would be so but for the fact that we are so rich no one can afford to hiss us. Labor has become arrogant and almost inconceivably materialistic. The earth and the fulness thereof belongs to the labor union. It seems to have learned nothing on its ascent upward from oppression. There is no more any glory in toil, nothing but a way in which to make money, and there is no other success for labor than in ever-shortening hours and ever-increasing pay. Perhaps labor is no worse than capital, but then labor might have been so much better than capital:

I see nothing in the propaganda of the new builders of democracy beyond an emburied: "It's our turn now." I hear no pronouncements from labor leaders on the worth and incalculable dignity of work done on honor. I hear only: "Fewer hours, more pay." The had workman demands the same wage as the good, and the right safeguarding of the employer is denied him, in that the had workman may not be discharged lest hydra-headed unions rise and hay out their hoycott. I find in labor as a class—the class it is rigorously fencing in from just intercourse with the complexity of civil life—no purer ardency than to eat, drink, and he merry, according to the elaborations evolved through years of luxury by the self-indulgent rich. As labor has been all envy, now he falls into a servility of imitation of that master he professed to scorn. He may have heard something to the effect that a man's soul may, without warning, be required of him, but an hour at the movies is sufficient to wipe out an uneasy suspicion that neither rich nor poor are immune from penalties. He is no kinder to his class than the former master of their fate has been. Capital squeezes out a weak competitor, hut labor would cut off the children of a city from their milk for an added per cent. in carrying it. He would silence the telephone for an increased wage and let the coal lie at the wharves while his neighbor shivers. He will "better the instruction" of his leaders that the way to go singing is to throw down the pack and melt the plowshare and pruning-hook into araesques for his palace of delight. But he is not, in his present orgy of repudiation and false values, a builder of palaces. He is a madman hollowing out the cell where inevitably he is bound, slouching along, a slothful giant hent on privilege. The old workman, dulled and servile at his worst, was more the man than this arrogant slacker. Even the old arduous task fervently pursued had threads of gold in it, the task that kept a man awake thinking out new ways of doing dull deeds better, that fostered in his soul a dumb allegiance, not to the master who oppressed him, hut the Maker of all, for the honest work of his hands. For then he did serve and beautify the world and his work smiled up at him.

We were going to build a new heaven and new earth in those early days of the war. There seemed almost to be a new dispensation, as the theologian might say. We imagined a world renovated, purified, regenerated, a world from which all evil had been swept away, a world to which we might joyously consecrate our energies and in which it would be ever more delightful to live. Perhaps they had no such illusions in Europe, but assuredly we had them here, and perhaps we were the better for them, dreams though they proved themselves to be. What was it that brought the disillusionment, that shattered the vision, that sent us back to the fleshpots?

What dreams we had in the days following our awakening in 1917, of the new earth at ease under a heaven friendly because it was unohsured, when we should have cleaned out the Augean stables filthy from the awakening of Barbarossa's horsemen! In that moment of anguish we were, for a heart's heat of terrified recognition, actually on the way back to old allegiances. The harvest rushed to cover in poetry and the thought of God. We believed with an eager credulity that mankind had at last learned that final lesson. The old injustices were dead. The phrase was current everywhere that those who had bought us that bright guerdon "must not die in vain." Our girls, in uniform vigor, did the most menial and most daring deeds with a soher efficiency. We said that woman, too, was set free from the toils of custom. She need no more assert her equality with man in the sterner virtues, for she had accepted the supreme challenge and endured the ordeal, chaste as Artemis, fearless as the Amazonian queens. What did she do, poor prisoner to her own arrogated instincts, when the armistice, which was no peace, hut a new complexity of strife, stripped of her emergency clothes and her emergency frame of mind? She who had won freedom for rhythmic muscles stepped into a skirt no wider than her brother's trouser leg and went hohhling along in it down the tittering isles of time. She mounted on the fool's dais of highest heels to peg about the more uncertainly, she painted over the bloom of her beauty with the cosmetics predicted by Mrs. Tanqueray for the raddled face of the passé demi-monde, and went forth in abbreviated chiffon to dance, "cheek to cheek," dances as ugly as provocative.

The author is not sure that the reaction has carried us even farther back than the point where we stood when the dream came. How precocious are now our young people, how sex-conscious. Decency, she says, is now very much like a clean shirt. We may be dirty enough underneath, but it is better to have the shirt. Our girls are not actually more attractive than they were, although doubtless they think they are. The girl will tell her elders to "shut up," but still she wants to be loved. She miscalculates, that's all. She knows what should be her destination, but she is fatally on the wrong road. It does not lead to love. It leads away from love. She, to, is "out of joint," like the rest of us.

The human race has not deliberately chosen to be immoral and uncouth. It means well, but it has lost its wits. It does not understand the things that it has seen. We can not assimilate our experiences. We can discuss the fate of Poland, the partition of Austria, the peace treaty, but we can not translate these things into terms of human misery. They seem far off, academic. Europe plunged herself into a vortex of frivolity after the signing of the armistice, and the things that we are doing we can "hardly have the face to confess." We call it reaction, the thoughtful ones among us, but reaction is only a name, and it is a name for something that is perilously like insanity.

Where are the roots of action, both in the individual and the race? I believe they are in the unseen, nourished by our will, starved through our neglect, and that the prime cause of deterioration in our public life is the decay of the imagination, that beautiful handmaid of the brain, that angel who drops manna when we hunger and sings us songs of the almost despaired-of "divine event toward which the whole creation moves." We have chilled and starved her "noble rage," elbowed her aside and trodden over her to our debasing quests. If we had given her the food of a right regard, she would have dwelt among us and taught us that worship accepted of the true gods. Our temples would have risen from sound foundations, we should have discoursed imperishable music until somehow the accordant intervals would have moved our blood to their own rhythm, and some child among us might have snatched more music from the stars to beguile us into those ravishments we are credulous of when we read about them in that age when the gods walked and the world was young. If we had followed the path of the imagination to the true gods, we should not be smashing one another at this game of fistcuffs for the mammoth gains of trade. And the imagination is not only the purveyor of beauty; she is the mother of sympathy as well. She can see into the hearts of God's children who bear the too grievous load, and feel with them the rasp of sobbing breath, the hunger and the thirst. She alone leads the doubting heart to that mingled tenderness and service and divine credulity which is called religion. She whispers into men's ear the rapt ecstasy: Credo, quia impossibile est.

Our time standards are short and the mills of God grind slowly. Perhaps we are not quite so anxious to forget the war, indeed to deny that there has been a war, as our publishers and our dramatists suppose. These gentry are much too apt to assume that they can feel the pulse of the public when actually they are only feeling its stomach, or maybe only their own stomach. The noises that are audible are rarely the representative noises. It may be that under the crust of a seeming indifference and even of cruelty the red fires are still burning brightly waiting only for the right time to show themselves. SIDNEY CORYN.

Recovery of valuable portions of materials formerly wasted is more and more a feature of American industrial economy. For many years there has been in use in many of the large engineering works a centrifugal separating machine which removes the oil from iron and steel turnings and borings and thus permits it to be used over again. The idea which underlies this machine has now been carried further and applied to the removal of the dust and dirt which unavoidably collect in oil used in the lubricating systems of marine and other large engines. The new machine is very similar in form and operates on the same principle as the now well-known centrifugal cream separator. The foul oil is fed continuously into the machine through a strainer which catches any gross particles, precisely as milk is fed into the cream separator. The purified oil escapes continuously, while the dust and dirt collect on the inner surface of the separating drum. Provision is made by which the attendant can instantly tell when the machine is choked with the deposited impurities.

A geological map of Iceland by Dr. Thoroddsen, who has spent many years on the work, gives much information about one of the world's most wonderful islands, which few visitors ever see. An example of the strangeness of Iceland is furnished by the volcano Katla. This is buried under immense snow fields, but from time to time its fires burst through the glittering blanket, and then such floods are poured from the melting ice that a great stretch of country between the volcano and the sea is inundated and huge masses of ice are carried out into the ocean. It is unsafe to cross the territory lying between Katla and the sea, so suddenly come the floods.

To imitate daylight for color comparisons an English artist has invented a concave reflector covered with a checkerboard arrangement of blue, green, and purple squares to be placed above an electric light.

Identification by finger-prints is generally supposed to be a modern detective device, but it appears that it was employed in Korea 1200 years ago, having been commonly used in the deeds for the sale of slaves.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

King Boris of Bulgaria is said to be an ardent fancier of live stock and some favored photographer recently "snapped" him as he was inspecting animals that belong to his estate.

Though he has been very little in the limelight there lives in Chicago the father-in-law of Governor Cox, Democratic candidate for President. He is Thomas S. Blair, Jr., who is reputed to be wealthy.

Rudyard Kipling was recently awarded the degree of LL. D. by the University of Edinburgh. Mr. Kipling indeed seems to be doing so well at the hands of his contemporaries that he might, if he were superstitious, almost begin to fear his future fate at the hands of posterity.

Georges Clemenceau, "the Tiger of France," its former premier, is reported to have arranged to go to India to hunt tigers. He was seventy-nine years old September 28th and his stomach is said to be so delicate that he can eat nothing without suffering but macaroni boiled in water without salt. Nevertheless he is said to be very robust and vigorous and scarcely less pliant physically than he is mentally.

Maurice Dekobra, the well-known Parisian humorist, who wrote "Rat de Cave; or, Burglary Considered as a Fine Art," and "Sammy, the American Volunteer," his reminiscences of the time he was attached to the A. E. F. as liaison officer, has arrived in this country, where he is going to deliver in English a series of lectures on the Parisiennes. He will talk on the character of French humor, on his bohemian days in Montmartre, and on other equally entertaining topics. M. Dekobra will be the first French author to deliver lectures in English.

Gail M. Williams of Portland, Oregon, is perhaps the youngest student in the states of Oregon and Washington to be admitted to freshman standing in a college this year. Gail is fourteen years old, the son of Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Williams, and this fall entered Whitman College as a full-fledged freshman. Gail is 4 feet 11 inches high, weighs ninety pounds, and wears knee pants, just like any other fourteen-year-old boy. Physically he is the same as any other boy, and contrary to the usual rule of advanced mentality and undeveloped body with lack of interest in sports, Gail takes much interest in athletics.

Frederick Santee, Harvard's youngest student, promises to shine in athletics as well as in the classroom, for his prowess as a baseball player already has excited wonderment second only to that occasioned by his genius in academic attainments. Enrolled in this year's freshman class just after passing his fourteenth birthday, Frederick must look back to the days of Cotton Mather to find one who entered the university so young. Frederick began to spell when he was two years old. Within a few weeks he could spell out whole sentences, and before he was three years old he had mastered the multiplication table. Besides English, he reads five languages fluently—French, Spanish, Latin, Greek, and German. He has passed analytical geometry, has begun working in calculus, and is well advanced in chemistry.

Marquis Saionji, the shrewd Japanese who did so well at the peace conference, has been made a prince. The head of the delegation gets the highest rank a Japanese subject can hold. Baron Makino, the next ranking member, becomes a viscount. Viscount Uchida, foreign minister, and Viscount Chinda, former Japanese ambassador to Great Britain, are made counts. A good group of other promotions are included, all for services in connection with the Versailles treaty. The only important Japanese figure failing to receive rank is Premier Hara, who, however, gets the Grand Cordon of the Rising Sun and Paulownia. Mr. Hara, doubtless, might have a title if he wished, but Mr. Hara, like Mr. Lloyd George in Britain, owes his rise and position to his democratic attitude, and, like the British premier, is unwilling to risk his standing by accepting a title.

Tim Murphy, the comedian, is a Vermonter by birth and a Southerner by choice, having made his home in Webster, Texas, for the last eight years. He goes there every summer and has become a real Texan, a booster for the largest state in the Union. While living in Texas he started an orange grove. Back in the days when Charlie Hoyt was producing his famous farces Tim Murphy was a member of his company, and remained with him for about six years, until he went out on tour with his own company. Murphy was one of the original Razzle-Dazzle Trio in the popular play, "The Brass Monkey," a satire on superstition, which was presented in 1888 and 1889. For eighteen years, until about six years ago, Tim Murphy took his own company around the country, playing "The Carpet-bagger," by Opie Reid and Frank Pixley, "The Texas Steer," and other plays.

Miss Sarah H. Young of San Francisco, who began her business career in St. Paul as a stenographer at $1500 a year and whose annual salary today is $48,000, does not believe one should work solely for the sake of the salary received. She advises holding a job that one likes and that has a future. She attributes her success to finding the one that suited her. She tried many positions, too, from stenographer-secretary to homesteader; from a law office to her present position as an efficiency expert. After a course in a business college Miss Young became under secretary to the late Governor John A. Johnson of Minnesota, in whose office she remained four years. Then she became executive secretary in the office of George T. Simpson, former attorney-general of Minnesota, and took a course at the St. Paul College of Law. Next she homesteaded in Montana, but farming there did not appeal to her as a life work. While she was proving up on her claim she spent almost every evening at typing, thus earning a "grub stake" and gaining experience which proved valuable when later she went to San Francisco and became an efficiency expert.

OLD FAVORITES.

A Match.

If love were what the rose is,
And I were like the leaf,
Our lives would grow together
In sad or singing weather,
Blown fields or flowerful closes,
Green pleasure or gray grief;
If love were what the rose is,
And I were like the leaf.

If I were what the words are,
And love were like the tune,
With double sound and single Delight our lips would mingle,
With kisses glad as birds are
That get sweet rain at noon;
If I were what the words are,
And love were like the tune.

If you were life, my darling,
And I your love were death,
We'd shine and snow together
Ere March made sweet the weather
With daffodil and starling
And hours of fruitful heath;
If you were life, my darling,
And I your love were death.

If you were thrall to sorrow,
And I were page to joy,
We'd play for lives and seasons
With loving looks and treasors
And tears of night and morrow
And laughs of maid and boy;
If you were thrall to sorrow,
And I were page to joy.

If you were April's lady,
And I were lord in May,
We'd throw with leaves for hours
And draw for days with flowers,
Till day like night were shady
And night were bright like day;
If you were April's lady,
And I were lord in May.

If you were queen of pleasure,
And I were king of pain,
We'd hunt down love together,
Pluck out his flying feather,
And teach his feet a measure,
And find his mouth a rein;
If you were queen of pleasure,
And I were king of pain.

Octopus.

By ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURN.

Strange beauty, eight-limbed and eight-handed,
Whence camest to dazzle our eyes?
With thy bosom bespangled and banded
With the hues of the seas and the skies;
Is thy home European or Asian,
O mystical monster marine?
Part molluscous and partly crustacean.
Betwixt and between.

Wast thou born to the sound of sea trumpets?
Hast thou eaten and drunk to excess
Of the sponges—thy muffins and crumpets,
Of the seaweed—thy mustard and cress?
Wast thou nurtured in caverns of coral,
Remote from reproof or restraint?
Art thou innocent, art thou immoral,
Sinburnian or Saint?

Lithe limbs, curling free, as a creeper
That creeps in a desolate place,
To enroll and envelop the sleeper
In a silent and stealthy embrace,
Cruel beak craning forward to bite us,
Our juices to drain and to drink,
Or to whelm us in waves of Cocytus,
Indelible ink!

O breast, that 'twere rapture to writhe on!
O arms 'twere delicious to feel
Clinging close with the crush of the Python,
When she maketh her murderous meal!
In thy eight-fold embraces enfolden,
Let our empty existence escape:
Give us death that is glorious and golden,
Crushed all out of shape!

Ah! thy red lips, lascivious and luscious,
With death in their amorous kiss,
Cling round us, and clasp us, and crush us,
With bitings of agonized bliss;
We are sick with the poison of pleasure,
Dispense us the potion of pain;
Ope thy mouth to its uttermost measure
And bite us again!

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS.

A British Staff Officer Describes Something of the Life of the High Command.

War books continue to come in spite of repeated assurances that we are all tired of them. Indeed they come, not in twos and threes, but in battalions, and presumably some one reads them. It is true that the quality of them has somewhat changed. We are no longer much interested in descriptions of actual fighting, not because the fighting itself has lost its fascination, but because the descriptions are so much alike. War became a matter of dreadful monotony. The experiences of one were the experiences of all, and single pictures took on a character of universality. But the world is just as much interested in the war itself as ever it was, and if we may judge from precedents it will continue to be interested for many long years to come. It will continue to read war books as long as those books contain anything new.

We have something distinctly new in a book entitled "G.H.Q.," by an author who signs himself "G.S.O." These initials obviously stand for "General Head Quarters" and "General Staff Officer," and a glance at the pages show that they relate to the British headquarters at Montreuil-sur-Mer and to the life led there by the high commanding officers. It was a life, says the author, in which the imagination had to go to sleep, for only thus could the war be directed. It was a life monkish in its denial of pleasures, rigid in discipline, exacting in labor, and yet not wholly an austere life.

Montreuil was chosen as head quarters because it was conveniently located and promised enough of quiet for the telephone services. And here the author gives us an anecdote which he says is a fable, but which gives him the always coveted opportunity to laugh at himself:

There used to be a fable—no one was fonder of giving it circulation than the Red Tabs—that there was a mutual agreement between the Germans and ourselves that G.H.Q. on both sides was to be spared from air raids.

"The arrangement is a classic instance of our stupidity," the Red Tab humorist would remark, "for the German scores both ways."

"How is that?"

"Well, his staff is spared, which is valuable to him. And our staff is spared, which is also valuable to him."

Life, says the author, was not tedious at head quarters, but he disclaims with some heat the dreadful story that there were ladies to wile away the monotony of official duties. No, there were no ladies at head quarters—at least not very many:

There were no ladies at G.H.Q., not at any rate in the sense that would be in the mind of the average inquirer. On the two rare occasions when I was able to get a leave from G.H.Q., or was sent over to London on a task, the civilians I encountered in London exhibited a considerable interest in the ladies that were thought to haunt G.H.Q.

This was by no manner of means an entirely or indeed a mainly feminine curiosity. Many people have an ineradicable idea that an army on a campaign ravages the hearts of all the female population of the occupied territory, as well as drawing on the beauty of its own land to recruit charming camp followers. I can recall, on returning from a small war some time before 1914, attending a dinner party in London and being tremendously flattered at the fact that as soon as the ladies present went upstairs all the men (some of them very distinguished men) crowded round me in a spirit of inquiry. With all the resources at my disposal I framed in my mind a brief and vivid appreciation of the campaign. But—they did not want to know why the Turkish army failed or the Serbian army succeeded. Some one rather well known in London had got into a scrape in the course of the campaign, and there were some very scandalous details alleged. My eager inquirers wanted to know all these scandalous details, and were obviously disappointed to learn that there was no reasonable foundation for them, and at once lost all interest in the campaign. My "appreciation" had not the chance to be uttered.

Probably they concluded I was rather an unintelligent person not to have discovered all the horrid details. Certainly those to whom I told the truth about the ladies and G.H.Q. thought I was very sly or very unobservant. Indeed one very hearty old gentleman, with a great passion for horrid details, patted me on the back publicly.

"That's right, that's right. I admire you for sticking to your friends. But of course we do not believe you."

We are told something about the nursing staff so far as it was a matter coming under the direction of head quarters. All nurses were called "Sister," although actually this term represents an intermediate grade between "nurse" and "matron." But there were different kinds of Sisters from the patient's point of view. Some were even known as "strafers":

A "straffer," in hospital language, is a Sister who by ten years or so of hard anxious work and self-denial has reached to the height of an office-boy's wage and a professional skill which saves lives daily and cuts weeks off one's stay in hospital. You are always glad when she has gone away from your wound, but at the back of your gladness is the knowledge that you want her for next dressing. A good "straffer" goes over a wound with the enthusiasm of a thrush with a large family going over a lawn for worms. She examines, searches, squeezes, probes, looking out for shed pieces of bone, for "proud flesh," for odd corners where inflammatory matter might lurk. She is looking for mischief, and any mischief found is promptly "strafed." If it is had she calls in the doctor; if it is minor she has her own little armory of mischief-breakers, scissors, pincers, nitrate of silver, and the like.

Matrons are easily offended. At a certain hospital in France the king was half expected as a visitor. The matron at once had a had attack of decoration fever. As I was a lightly wounded that time I assisted her policy of deceiving his majesty into thinking that the hospital was always a fairly bowery by going out and "finding" some flowers. Then Matron had clean quilts on all the beds, and the order went forth that these were to be kept creaseless and smooth. But one patient would persist in crooking up his knees. Matron argued with him. He disloyally pleaded that he was much more comfortable that way. Now, having got the flowers for the ward, I thought I had the right to give advice as a sort of accomplice, and I suggested mildly: "Better break his knees, Matron."

She was offended. Then the king did not come after all; and I think she was inclined to blame me for that.

There was a certain etiquette even among the patients. A medical case naturally ranked lower than a surgical case and was correspondingly looked down upon. Even the Sister would sometimes refer to "only a medical case," and there were instances where men had their heads bandaged for headaches in order at least to simulate a wound. And then there was a sort of competition among the wounded:

It is etiquette in a military hospital to be very much interested in one's neighbor's wounds and to affect to hold lightly one's own. It is very hard form to hint that your lot is more severe than his lot.

"Oh, I am all right, thanks," (you say in answer to his first advances); "except for a bit of my liver and a few yards of my lung blown away, I'm as fit as can be. But that looks an awful leg of yours."

"Not at all, not at all. It is almost certain now to stay on. But it must be horribly interesting to have a body wound."

And so the ghoulish chat goes on.

The feeding of the horses proved at one time to be quite a problem, and it was found necessary to organize a local growth of fodder crops wherever there was a chance:

Horse-masters can best judge the rights of the fodder position for themselves by noting the actual animal ration. Taking an average of 25,000 horses, light and heavy, the weight of the rations at the time of the controversy was: American, 23.6 pounds; British, 22.2 pounds; French, 16.1 pounds.

Twenty-two pounds weight of food per day is not excessive for a horse doing hard work; and that was the average. After the heavy horses had their higher ration the light horses had to be content with less.

Probably the French never saw our point of view and suspected that there was not much more than English obstinacy in this determined stand for the welfare of the dumb beasts. But the controversy was carried on with good humor all the same, and in the end "those curious English" had their own way.

Whenever questions such as this arose between the Allied forces it proved in practice that the Americans usually had the deciding voice. Perhaps it may be recorded without hurting any one's feelings that the American as a matter of instinct was inclined usually to take the French side, because his stronger sympathy was in that direction; after experience he was inclined usually to take the British side, for his manner of thinking was more on our lines.

Chinese labor was a very notable help to the army, but it furnished its own distinctive problems. The Chinaman had no intention to work unless he was compelled, but he would work splendidly when he was compelled:

The Chinaman knew by his contract that he was not to suffer war risks, that he was not supposed to work under shell-fire, and he was soon sufficiently advanced to interpret an occasional air bombardment as "shell-fire," and to give it as a reason for demanding more pay. As a rule he was willing to take risks, if he were paid extra. When sick or wounded he was a great nuisance, for if a Chinaman died of sickness whilst in the charge of the white man the conclusion was that he had been done to death. Ordinarily a sick Chinaman demobilized two workers—himself and some member of his own secret society who had to accompany him to hospital to see that all was fair.

The most earnest effort was therefore made to keep the Chinaman from dying, not only from ordinary motives of humanity, but because as a corpse he was an even greater nuisance. A British soldier might be buried in a blanket, but the Chinese dead had to have wooden coffins, and their graveyards had to be chosen with great care—preferably in a valley with a stream running through it. All this to satisfy the spiritual world of the Chinese, which seems to be very exigent in such matters. The official instructions regarding Chinese graves stated: "The ideal site to secure repose and drive away evil spirits is on sloping ground with a stream below, or gully down which water always or occasionally passes. The grave should not be parallel to the N.E. or W. This is specially important to Chinese Mohammedans. It should be about four feet deep, with the head towards the hill and the feet towards the water. A mound of earth about two feet high is piled over the grave."

The Dominion forces furnished a study in human nature that proved a bit perplexing. The Australian, for example, was wholly different from the Britisher and from the Canadian. He was "more resourceful, more resolute, more cruel, more impatient" than his British cousin. And he was quite aware of his own distinctiveness, so to speak:

About this here is an illustrative story, which is welcomed as "quite Australian." When the Australian gunboat Protector arrived in Chinese waters the British admiral went on board to pay his compliments and was not stinting in praise of Australian military and naval prowess. Thereupon the Australian hand is said to have struck up with a tune from "The Belle of New York": "Of course you can never be quite like us."

It is perhaps a true story; certainly possible. There is a touch of gay impudence in the Australian character which an ex-governor confessed he loved "because it was so young."

Always one comes back to that word "young." It is the key to an understanding of the Anzac—youth with its enthusiasms, rashnesses, faults, shynesses; youth, raw, if you will, but of good breed and high intentions.

The Anzac in his ideals of mateship and of stoicism is compared by the author with the Bedouin of tradition. He loves his horse, his dog; and the stranger within his gates. He will share his last water with his horse, and his hospitality is proverbial:

An English padre who put in two years in the "Back of Beyond" of Australia as a "Bush Brother" confesses that his first impression was that the Anzac of the Bush was "cruel and pagan. His last impression was that the Anzac was generally as fine a Christian as any heaven for human beings would want. An incident of this parson's "conversion" (he related) was the entry into a far-back town of a hand of five men carrying another on a stretcher. The six were opal miners with a little claim far out in the desert. One had been very badly mauled in an explosion. The others stopped their profitable work at once and set themselves to carry him in to the nearest township with a hospital. The distance was forty-five miles. On the road some of the party almost perished of thirst, but the wounded man had his drink always, and always the handages on his crushed leg were kept moist in the fierce heat of the sun. One of the men was asked how they had managed to make this sacrifice.

"It was better to use the water that way than to hear the poor highter moan."

There were printing presses and newspapers in connection with the army. There was a highly efficient department with machinery of the most modern type at Boulogne, Abbéville, and elsewhere, and it was used also by the Americans and the French:

American army publications were normally somewhat more solemn and staid than our own. Occasionally, however, the American humor broke out, as in the gas-warning leaflet, which had not, perhaps, the sanction of American G.H.Q., but was widely (and usefully) circulated in the trenches. It began:

In a Gas Attack

There Are Only Two Crowds

The Quick and the Dead

Be Quick and Get That Gas Mask On!

After the armistice the printing services, no longer so much pressed with other army work, were able to undertake some purely educational printing. But by this time demobilization was sweeping away the classes, and the best of the opportunity had passed.

There was complete amity, although many differences of opinion, between the American and the British commands. Each had its own plan for the supply of underclothing and boots and for the thousand details of army life:

It would be impossible to praise too highly the common sense and civility of the American liaison officers who had to argue out these points with our officers. They were never unreasonable, and were very prompt in crediting our officers with politeness and good will. That Americans and British can get on very well together this campaign has proved. I think that in every case where an American and a British division were thrown together they parted company with a marked increase of mutual good-will and respect.

Everything possible was done to furnish the American forces with whatever they needed, and it was the general rule that American requisitions were to have priority:

American liaison officers at G.H.Q. "made good" with the British staff very quickly. They had a downright earnestness of manner which was very engaging. The American staff seemed to have been chosen strictly for efficiency reasons and, there being no obstacles of established custom to overcome, the best men got to the top very quickly. The appointment of Mr. Frederick Palmer, the famous war correspondent, to a high post on General Pershing's intelligence staff was an example of their way of doing things. Colonel Palmer as war correspondent had seen much of this and of many other wars. For his particular post he was an ideal man. But it would be difficult to imagine him stepping at once into so high a position in a European army.

Finally we have an appreciation of the American fighting man, whose energy and resourcefulness won full recognition everywhere:

The Americans, when they got into action, first as auxiliaries of British and French divisions, then in their own army organization, were fine fighters. Their splendid physique made them very deadly in a close tussle, and they had a business-like efficiency in battle that did not appeal to the Boche. A favorite American weapon at close quarters was a shotgun sawn off short at the barrel. It was of fearful effect. The enemy had the sublime impudence to protest against this weapon as "contrary to the usages of civilized warfare." This was cool indeed from the folk who made us familiar with the murder of civil hostages, the use of civilians as fire screens, and the employment of poison gas as methods of warfare. The Americans answered the impudent protest with peremptory firmness, and kept the shotgun in use.

We are told very little of the actual fighting, but perhaps we have already been told enough—at least for the present. But the picture of life at head quarters is distinctly novel, as it is certainly distinctly interesting. There are also many good and relevant illustrations.

The once famous battleship Iowa, which played a part in the destruction of Cervera's fleet at Santiago in 1898, is being prepared at the Philadelphia Navy Yard for what will be one of the most remarkable target experiments ever attempted. Proceeding unmanned, but under her own steam and controlled by radio, probably from seaplanes, the old battleship will become the objective of the big guns of the Atlantic fleet super-dreadnoughts in Chesapeake Bay. This will be the first time that American warships have used a moving craft for a target except in actual war. Two of the Iowa's boilers are being converted to burn oil, so that the ship may continue under way with no one aboard once her fires have been started and her engines placed in motion.

While making excavations for a car barn in Christiana workmen found the remains of the stronghold of the notorious Bishop Nikolas Arneson, who figures in Ibsen's "Kongsemnerne" as Bishop Nikolas. The building was erected in the eleventh century and the find is considered of such unusual historical importance that the authorities of Christiana are trying to reach an agreement with the railroad by which the ruins can be scientifically excavated and the car barn built somewhere else.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending October 30, 1920, were $156,200,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $162,800,000; a decrease of $6,600,000.

Resources of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco rose $2,151,000 during the week ending October 29th, compared with the week previous. All of the other principal aggregates were lower. Total gold held by the bank was less by $1,834,000; total gold reserves by $2,609,000; total reserves by $2,494,000; total bills on hand by $3,094,000; total earning assets by $2,954,000.

The results of the past year's working of the Anglo-South American Bank, Ltd., must be gratifying to the directors and in the highest degree satisfactory to the shareholders. For the year to June 30th last the net profit of £1,024,000 was not far short of double that secured for the previous year. The total distribution for the year is 25 per cent., which includes a special interim dividend at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum. An amount of £211,000 is placed to reserves of various kinds and £393,000 is carried forward. A sum of £58,600 has been applied in payment in connection with the acquisition of the shares of the British Bank of South America.

The former legal head of one of America's largest corporations died recently and it was necessary to realize on many of his investments in order to divide his estate among the beneficiaries of his will. When the executors began the examination of his security holdings they found that practically all of them were selling at pitifully low prices, as compared with what he had paid for them. The depreciation of his estate, because of the general decline in bond prices, was enormous. The bonds themselves were as secure as when he had bought them; but 4 per cent. issues that he had paid par for some years ago were selling in the eighties. He had put the savings from a good salary into good grade municipal and corporation bonds. In some cases he had bought substantial blocks, if not entire issues, of small towns, to which he was personally attached because of early association with them. There was no real market for those bonds; buyers would have to be searched for if they were to be sold.

This able attorney had spent his life serving others and when it came to the investment of his savings he had followed the sound practice of buying the best grade securities, and then he probably gave little further attention to them. They paid their interest regularly—why should he give much thought to them? He was a busy man.

An officer of one of the largest New York trust companies, who is identified with the trust department where careful watch is kept of investments, said to me once: "An investment policy which merely entertains the policy of buying to hold to maturity obviously disregards opportunities alternately to expand and to conserve the value of the principal, and entirely ignores certain fundamental economic principles as to the relationship between security prices and the value, or purchasing power, of money. To take advantage of these opportunities to expand the principal is by no means speculating in bonds, and to fail to take reasonable cognizance of them to conserve one's principal is an offense against the principle of sound investment."

This latter is what the eminent attorney had not done. He had bought long-term bonds when their prices were high, and now that his holdings must be liquidated in a period of low bond prices, there was a large shrinkage in his estate. Of course, had he not died at this time, but lived ten or twenty years longer, his bonds might have swung back again in price so that the realizable value of his investments would have been as much as he paid for them. Possibly he considered that it was not worth his time to keep watch of his investments and make change in them to meet changing conditions. But many people never even give that much thought to the matter. Many who do not even buy the best securities, as he did, give them as little further attention. And it is true that eternal vigilance is the price of safety in investments as in many other things.

A man who not long since went with one of the largest investment banking houses, after being for many years a close student of investments from the theoretical viewpoint, recently told me that the more he saw of the practical side of the business the more he became convinced that the chief thing to be looked out for in making investments was the conservation of the principal. He had in mind more particularly the guarding against loss on securities that go bad for one reason or another, or that were never good investments to start with; but what he said applies also to the lowering of security values due to the economic changes to which the trust company official referred. There is even a problem for those who, like this corporation attorney, know that the highest grade securities are the best in the long run. It is to guard against the seasonal savings such as the one which caused so much depreciation in the lawyer's estate. How is this to be done?

The thing for the investor to watch closest is the trend of commodity prices. Bond prices move in the opposite direction from commodity prices. When it costs less to live people are satisfied with a lower return on their money; they will pay higher prices for bonds. But as the cost of living goes up, they require a larger return from their investments and will not pay as high prices for bonds. New issues are brought out at higher interest rates and the old issues have to meet the competition of these in the market. The amount of liquid capital available for investment at various times also has an influence on the price at which bonds are offered, but the factor is not as important as the level of commodity prices.

A study of the commodity price index over a long period of years shows that the swings in living costs have been accompanied by movements in the opposite directions in bond prices. During and following the civil war, for example, when prices of commodities were high, bonds were low. The railroads had to do their financing with 6 and 7 per cent. mortgage bonds. The last of these were curiosities in the market a few years ago. Then followed a long downward swing of commodity prices until 1896, and bond prices went up until around the opening of the present the railroads were financing with 3½ per cent. bonds at par. Since then there has been the upward trend in the cost of living with which every one is familiar, and now the railroads are back again to 7 per cent. issues and the French government, in order to secure funds in this country to meet its share of the Anglo-French loan, has to sell an 8 per cent. bond at par.

These are the changing conditions which the trust company official says that not to take cognizance of is an offense against the principles of sound investment. And by taking advantage of them, one will not only conserve the principal of his investment, but may conceivably add materially to his principal. For by buying long-term bonds when commodity prices are high and bonds low, and changing them for short-term securities when the bonds reach high levels, keeping one's funds thus temporarily invested until bonds again decline in price, a substantial growth in the principal of the investment would result. One can not, of course, tell just when the end of each swing has come, but they are such broad movements that one does not need to call the turn. By applying this theory of investment today one would certainly be buying long-term bonds. In fact, it looks as though the upturn in them had started, but even if it has not, it is safe to say that commodity prices will some day be lower than at present and good grade bonds will be selling much higher. As the trust officer quoted above says: "There can be little doubt that those who buy well secured long-term bonds now will have very little cause for regret."—John K. Barnes in the Century Magazine.

President Mortimer Fleishacker of the Anglo-California Trust Company was host at a very enjoyable banquet on October 28th at the Palace Hotel, San Francisco, given to the twenty-two officers and heads of departments of his company. The banquet was a testimonial to the splendid spirit of good-fellowship and cooperation that permeates this progressive institution. At the banquet Mr. Fleishacker stated that he was particularly pleased with the rapid growth of the company. On August 1, 1916, the total deposits of the company were a little more than $11,000,000; today they are almost $28,000,000, which is an increase of about 150 per cent. in four years. The company now has five complete banks in San Francisco, with the main bank at Market and Sansome Streets and branches at 101 Market Street, Fillmore and Geary Streets, Sixteenth and Mission Streets, and Third and Twentieth Streets.

Wide interest from all parts of the state is manifested in the Pacific Gas and Electric Company's first preferred stock. The corporation is now offering $5,000,000 of this stock direct to the public. Up to date nearly 1000 Californians have demonstrated their confidence in the company's preferred issues by investing in them prior to the present issue.

The preferred stock of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company probably is the most widely owned investment issue in the state, with the exception of Liberty bonds.

The company did a gross business of $32,038,038 for the year ended August 31st and earned a surplus of $3,573,367 available dividends. The assets on August 31st exceeded $15,000,000, of which $6,918,000 was in cash. United States treasury certificates, or other practically cash items.

The Pacific Gas and Electric Company owns and operates extensive properties employed in the production and sale of electricity and gas for light, heat, and power, about 56 per cent. of its operating revenues being derived from electricity and about 38 per cent. from gas. It is also engaged in street railway operation and in the sale of steam for heating and of water for irrigation and domestic purposes, deriving approximately 6 per cent. of its revenues from these and other less important activities.

The company was organized under the laws of California in 1905 as a consolidation of a number of well-established public utilities, including some of the earliest and most successful hydro-electric developments on the Pacific Coast. Its gas business dates back sixty-six years, its steam electric business forty-one years, and its hydro-electric development twenty-five years.

The operations of the company extend into thirty-three counties of central and northern California, having an area of 47,000 square miles and a population at the 1910 census of 1,390,000, or approximately 58 per cent. of the population of the entire state. The company's business field embraces a present estimated population of 1,845,175, and includes the important San Francisco Bay section and the fertile Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys.

The Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company report the following items taken from the latest statement of Barker Brothers, dated September 30, 1920, which make a remarkable showing:

	April 30, 1920.	July 31, 1920.	Sept. 30, 1920.
Net quick assets.....	$353	$381	$399
Total net assets.....	413	446	468

Over the five months that have elapsed since this stock was first offered the latest statement shows cash has increased 20 per cent. approximately, notes and accounts receivable increased approximately 25 per cent., while merchandise only increased about 10 per cent. For the same period current liabilities decreased about 15 per cent.

cause. An analysis of the situation shows that it is more nearly correct to say that the land banks went out of business because the interest rates went up. When the United States government, with all of the national resources behind its obligations, is compelled to pay 6 per cent., it is not to be expected that Federal Land Banks could borrow at 4½ per cent. When the land banks could no longer sell bonds to the public at 4½ per cent. a kind-hearted Congress went to their rescue with cash from the public treasury.

With railroad and industrial securities and commercial paper yielding 7 per cent. to 9 per cent. no investors except rich tax dodgers could afford to buy the Federal Land Bank 4½ per cent. tax-exempt bonds.

requires that 15 per cent. of the net earnings of the company be put into a sinking fund to retire the issue at 105. Earnings so far this year would require a little more than $150,000 of the preferred stock to be retired, should the company only break even from now on until the first of the year. It is a matter of record that December is always one of their largest and most profitable months.

However, assuming that only $150,000 of this stock will be retired, there would be $850,000 left outstanding. In this case the net quick assets applicable to each share of this preferred stock would amount to $470, while total net assets would amount to $550.

German exports to England has already surpassed the highest pre-war records—in textiles, for instance.

It is extremely difficult for American buyers of German goods to close big contracts on account of the fluctuating exchange. England has facilities through its banks offered to English commission and export houses, whereby an English buyer of German goods may settle against every big deal mark exchange six and nine months ahead.

Germany is in the market for billions of pounds of American cotton, American wheat and flour, American copper, American hardware, and so on. It is evident that with the depreciated value of German paper money Germany can not buy very much here. Therefore it is in the interest of trade that another medium of exchange takes the place of the German paper money, and that can only be an exchange of merchandise. If America is anxious to get the former largest customer of American materials back, the importation of German manufactures must be facilitated to make possible an exchange of goods. Since an exchange of merchandise is based upon a stable medium of exchange, American bankers and financiers have to follow the English lead in this respect: make agreements with German banks and financiers to enable the settling of forward exchange contracts against every import or export contract.

This system of forward exchange contracts is ruling in the Far East for every business transaction with foreign countries and is one of the main activities of the banks there. Shanghai, for instance, a city with only about 15,000 white people, has about two dozen banks and two hundred exchange brokers doing nothing but settling the daily exchange contracts for their customers with the respective banks. England has instituted this business with Germany now and already gets ahead of all the other business nations in the world in this lucrative trade.—Karl Offer.

The wide interest displayed in the development of the immense western shale fields is more than justified by the rather alarming increase of oil consumption over production. In this connection it may be mentioned that as a reserve for the use of the navy the United States government has withdrawn in Colorado 45,440 acres and in Utah 86,584 acres of shale land. In the Utah portion of the Uintah Basin alone there are available more than 40,000,000,000 tons of oil shale that will yield more than a barrel of oil to the ton.

In an article on shale recently published in the New York Tribune that paper quotes Professor Victor C. Alderson, dean of the Colorado School of Mines, as follows: "The supply of oil shale in Colorado and Utah alone exists in tremendous and unlimited quantities. In Colorado there is enough of it immediately available for 100 retort plants using 2000 tons a day to work 800 years. There is seven times as much available oil a square mile from a ten-foot vein of oil shale as has been produced or will be produced from a square mile of proven oil ground. The shale drops out of the surface of ground in strata form. There is so much of it above the surface that we need not worry about the lower levels. Digging for it would be useless expense."

Canada's harvest this year will total 25,000,000 tons of hay and corn and 1,250,000,000 bushels of other field crops, as compared with 20,000,000 tons and something over 1,000,000,000 bushels for 1919, according to official figures. It is estimated that the price of 1920 wheat will average $2 per bushel. The field crops represent about $170 per head of population.

Watson & Co., investment securities, are offering 5000 shares (common stock) of the Golden State Motion Picture Corporation, controlling all the productions of H. H. Van Loan, author. The corporation's capitalization is 5000 common shares ($100 par value), 3000 of which are to be presently issued and 300 founders' shares (no par value), all of which are to be presently issued. This corporation will have no funded debt or preferred stock.

The Golden State Motion Picture Corporation was formed under the laws of Delaware, and with the proceeds of the sale of its common stock it will proceed immediately to engage the best director obtainable and secure the proper company to produce H. H. Van Loan's latest masterpieces.

His first story has been passed on by several of the best judges of photo plays in the United States, who pronounce it one of the best and strongest ever presented to them, and there is little question but what it will surpass in earnings Mr. Van Loan's last two successes, namely, "The Great Redeemer" and "The Virgin of Stamboul."

The sources of income of the corporation are the following: First, the sale of pictures produced by them to large distributors, with whom contracts will have been made previous to the starting of pictures; second, the leasing of pictures produced on a royalty basis.

The holders of the common stock will receive cash cumulative dividend up to $10 per share per annum before the founders' stock receives a dividend. Thereafter the holders of the founders' stock will receive $10 per share before any additional dividends may be paid on the common stock. Thereafter the common stock will receive one-half of any further profits. The common stock has priority of the founders' stock as to assets in liquidation up to 110 per cent., or $110 per share. No further amount of the authorized common stock may be issued until the company's earnings are well assured.

The directors of the company believe the financial plan to be sound in principle and estimates made to be well within reasonable expectations, and that the company will be in a position to earn a handsome return on the necessary capital expenditures.

That the water utilities of California have been "hard hit" lately is pointed out in the annual report of the railroad commission, which has just been transmitted to the governor.

Referring to rates for water, the commission points out that the increased cost of everything entering into the operation of this type of utility, coupled with lowered water levels which forced expensive pumping operations, made it imperative that aid be given the water companies, particularly in view of the fact that the health and well-being of entire communities depended upon properly functioning water utilities.

"In all," says the commission, "relief was
